

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

CIHM/ICMH
Microfiche Series.

CIHM/ICMH Collection de microfiches.

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

© 1984

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- Coloured covers/Couverture de couleur
- Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagée
- Covers restored and/or laminated/Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- Cover title missing/Le titre de couverture manque
- Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur
- Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- Coloured plates and/or illustrations/Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- Bound with other material/Relié avec d'autres documents
- Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure
- Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- Additional comments:/ Commentaires supplémentaires:

- Coloured pages/Pages de couleur
- Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées
- Pages restored and/or laminated/Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- Pages detached/Pages détachées
- Showthrough/
Transparence
- Quality of print varies/Qualité inégale de l'impression
- Includes supplementary material/Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- Only edition available/Seule édition disponible
- Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/
Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	14X	18X	22X	26X	30X
<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>
12X	16X	20X	24X	28X	32X

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

Metropolitan Toronto Library
Social Sciences Department

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol \rightarrow (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ∇ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Metropolitan Toronto Library
Social Sciences Department

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole \rightarrow signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ∇ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

laire
s détails ques du nt modifier tger une e filmage

d/uées

aire

by errata ned to

ent une pelure, façon à

32X

Th

The Religions of the World

The Guild Text Books.

Entirely new editions, reprinted from the latest British editions, issued in new, tasteful, substantial styles of flexible cloth and reinforced paper bindings.

16mo, paper, each, net 25 cts.; flexible cloth, each, net 40 cts.

The Old Testament and Its Contents. By Prof. James Robertson, D.D., of the University of Glasgow.

"An admirable help for all Biblical students."—The Christian Enquirer.

Religions of the World. By Principal G. M. Grant, D.D., of Queens University, Canada.

"Lucid, concise, reliable and comprehensive."—The New York Observer.

The Presbyterian Churches: Their Place and Power in Modern Christendom. By Rev. J. N. Ogilvie, M.A. With a Chapter on the Presbyterian Church in the United States, by Rev. Andrew C. Zenos, D.D., author of "Compendium of Church History."

"We are charmed with the workmanlike manner in which these manuals have been prepared."—The Critic.

Landmarks of Church History. By Prof. Henry Cowan, D.D.

"There are thousands who will be drawn out of the prejudice of ignorance into a little true knowledge and sympathy by means of this able and unassuming little work."—The Expository Times.

The New Testament and Its Writers. By Rev. J. A. M'Clymont, D.D.

"Our last word to intelligent Christians, old and young, is to get it and assimilate it."—The Independent.

Our Lord's Teaching. By Rev. James Robertson, D.D.

"Most excellent and timely."—The Literary World.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Fleming H. Revell Company

NEW YORK: 158 Fifth Ave.
CHICAGO: 63 Washington St.
TORONTO: 154 Yonge St.

ks.

test British ial styles
adings.

Prof. James
asgow.
—The Chris-

M. Grant,
—The New

d Power in
ilvie, M.A.
urch in the
nos, D.D., ory.”
ner in which

nry Cowan, of the preju-

sympathy by The Exposit-

Rev. J. A.

nd young, is

rtson, D.D.
orld.

ny
Fifth Ave.
ashington St.
ange St.

THE GUILD TEXT BOOKS

THE Religions of the World

IN RELATION TO CHRISTIANITY

BY

Principal G. M. Grant, D.D.

Of Queens University, Canada

New York Chicago Toronto

Fleming H. Revell Company

Publishers of Evangelical Literature

E 86616

THE
brief Religi
learned
It was the w Moth
for co
has b been withi
glad t
the c
they a
the in sides life an fellow

Chris

THE CAXTON PRESS
NEW YORK.

EDITORIAL NOTE

THE Editors have much pleasure in issuing this brief but luminous account of the non-Christian Religions of the World from the pen of the learned Principal of Queen's University, Canada. It was a gratification to them when he undertook the work at the request of a Committee of his Mother-Church, and they feel that there is reason for congratulation on the manner in which the task has been accomplished. Severe condensation has been necessary in order to treat such a subject within the limits prescribed, but the Editors are glad to think that this has not perceptibly impaired the charm and vigour of the writer's style, and they anticipate for the book a warm welcome from the intelligent and large-hearted youth on both sides of the Atlantic, who feel an interest in the life and thought of the countless millions of their fellow-men that are still beyond the pale of the Christian Church.

WRIT
have treatin the n necess
mate religio
—is d embra
world
the w
into d fictin
be the into c statin origin divine even noted, pharis thisin believ

AUTHOR'S PREFACE

WRITERS of text-books for Guilds and Bible Classes have sometimes complained of the difficulty of treating their subject, because of its extent and of the narrowness of the limits to which they were necessarily restricted. If the complaint is legitimate when only a phase or department of one religion—and that a religion known to the readers—is discussed, what shall be said when the subject embraces four of the great extant religions of the world? In this case the limitations imposed upon the writer must be obvious to all. He cannot go into details; where the evidence is meagre or conflicting, he must simply give what he believes to be the truth, without giving his reasons or entering into controversy; and he must be satisfied with stating “the fundamentals” of each religion, its origin, the laws of its growth, and its place in the divine education of the world, in such a way that even when its imperfections or perversions are noted, these may be looked at, not externally and pharisaically, but with understanding and sympathising minds. The writer of this little volume believes that Jesus is “the way, the truth, and the life," and that His religion is the absolute religion. Therefore, he believes it to be right and wise to call attention to the excellent features of other religions rather than to their defects; to the good rather than to the bad fruit which they have borne; in a word, to treat them as a rich man should treat his poorer brothers, drawing near to and touching them, getting on common ground and then sharing with them his rich inheritance. He does not pretend that an adequate account will be found here of all the phases of any one of the great religions; but a sketch is attempted, in the spirit that should animate an intelligent Confucianist, Hindoo, Buddhist, or Mohammedan, to whom the task of describing Christianity briefly was assigned.

G. M. GRANT.

CHA
I
1. M
2. T
3. C
4. S
5. I
6. S
7. I
8. S

D

religion.
wise to
of other
the good they have rich man near to ground
eritance.
account any one tempted, intelligent
nmedan, ty briefly

RANT.

CONTENTS

CHAP.	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	I
1. MOHAMMEDANISM	12
2. THE CAUSES OF THE SUCCESS AND OF THE DECADENCE OF MOHAMMEDANISM	26
3. CONFUCIANISM	42
4. SOURCES OF THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF CONFUCIANISM	63
5. HINDUISM	79
6. SOURCES OF THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF HINDUISM	96
7. BUDDHISM	108
8. SUCCESS AND FAILURE OF BUDDHISM	126

RI

Reli

T

a un note sour inde perse pitie
norm
the a

R
It lif

1 C
of the

THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD

INTRODUCTION

Religion universal—Rooted in human nature—Indicates that which is highest in man—Many forms of religion—The unsystematised and the systematised religions—Decay of the former when in contact with the latter—Every systematised religion has produced a civilisation—Each good in its day—Eighteenth-century idea of religion—Superiority of the modern point of view—Comparative examination of the great religions necessary to prove that Christianity is a special revelation—Attitude of the prophets, of the apostles, and of Jesus to other religions is the right attitude for Christian missionaries.

THE highest authorities are now agreed that "it is legitimate to call religion in its most general sense a universal phenomenon of humanity."¹ Religion is a note of the race. It cannot be derived from outward sources any more than thinking or loving. There are, indeed, persons destitute of religion, just as there are persons destitute of intellect or affections—all alike to be pitied as we pity the deaf, the dumb, or the blind—but normal human beings are religious. "Atheism is only the attempt not to be so" (Nitzsch).

Religion also indicates what is the highest in man. It lifts him above the senses and relates him in some way to the universe, or the infinite and eternal, of which he is a part. Hegel says, "All peoples know that the religious consciousness is that wherein they possess the truth; and religion they have ever regarded as their true dignity and the Sabbath of their life."

¹ C. P. Tiele, Outlines of the History of Religion to the Spread of the Universal Religions.

The religions of the world may be classified into systematised and unsystematised. The latter include all those crude and incoherent notions by which savage tribes explain to themselves the problems of existence. Strange and horrible as these religions often are, they indicate man's nobleness, for they express his gropings after God. As Vinet puts it, "They are painful cries of the soul, torn from its centre and separated from its object." But, however interesting to students of humanity, these will soon be only matters for the antiquary; for, as certainly as lesser lights vanish on the rising of the sun, so these disappear when brought into contact with any coherent religion. Their votaries throw away the notions and misshapen idols of their fathers for others that are associated with higher forms of living. Even when the new faith is only imperfectly apprehended, the old, at any rate, is discarded. This fact or law explains the success of Hinduism in continuing to bring within its pale the aboriginal tribes of India; the success of Mohammedanism in Central Africa, the East India Islands, and elsewhere; the success of Buddhism in Tartary, Mongolia, Corea, and Japan; and of Christianity among the Kols, Santhals, Bheels, and Karens in Asia, and among the savages of the Polynesian Islands. It is a very different thing when one systematised religion meets another. Victory, then, cannot be expected to incline to either side, until there has been an intelligent study by each of the sources of the other's strength, an appreciation of the spiritual and social needs which it has met, and an absorption, by the one that has most inherent excellence and power of assimilation, of all in the other that caused it to be accepted and retained for centuries by millions of human beings.

Every systematised religion has given birth to a civilisa Babyl

others,
away, Peru b and it adequa side b interw profess intellig
in the an ins Hebre
faith, v extant Buddh
most r divide themse scale th taking crowni triumph

Let
blessing
They n
has a c martyrs before historia the wor
not kno
There i called t ing, 'b have in

1 Mar
229, 258-

civilisation. The Egyptian, Phœnician, Hittite, Assyrian, Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greek, Roman, and many others, with their attendant civilisations, have passed away, as completely as those that existed in Mexico and Peru before Cortez and Pizarro landed on their shores, and it is sometimes difficult for us to get accurate or adequate knowledge of them. But others still stand, side by side with Christianity, great historic religions interwoven with civilisations hoary with age. They are professed by great and compact societies of industrious, intelligent men and women. They are identified in the affections of their votaries with venerated names, an insult to whom is as unpardonable as an insult to Hebrew prophets or apostles, or even the Founder of our faith, would be felt to be by us. The greatest of these extant religions are the Mohammedan, the Hindu, the Buddhist, and the Confucian. Of these, therefore, it is most necessary to treat. As a matter of fact, they now divide the ground with Christianity. They have proved themselves so enduring and so suited to men on a great scale that, if Christianity should succeed in absorbing and taking the place of one of them, it would be a more crowning demonstration of its superiority than was its triumph over the religions of Greece and Rome.

Let us clearly understand that all these religions were blessings to the peoples among whom they originated. They marked a stage of progress in their history. Each has a calendar crowded with the names of saints and martyrs. Yet, in spite of this,¹ "No judge, if he had before him the worst criminal, would treat him as most historians and theologians have treated the religions of the world." "There is no religion, or if there is I do not know it, which does not say, 'do good, avoid evil.' There is none which does not contain what Rabbi Hillel called the quintessence of all religions, the simple warning, 'be good, my boy.' Add 'for God's sake,' and we have in it very nearly the whole of the Law and the Prophets." "People who judge of religions by their inevitable excrescences are like those who judge of the health of a people from its hospitals, or its morality from its prisons. If we want to judge of a religion we must try to study it as much as possible in the mind of its founder; and when that is impossible, as it too often is, try to find it in the lonely chamber and the sick-room rather than in the colleges of augurs and the councils of priests."

¹ Max Müller, Introduction to the Science of Religion, pp. 216-220, 258-262.

This is surely a legitimate and even necessary point of view from which to regard religions. It is, however, very different from that which prevailed in Britain more than a century ago. Then, a shallow deism considered all religions alike as having originated in the policy of statesmen or the craft of priests, operating on the ignorance and credulity of the masses, with the object of securing an effective moral police or of gaining wealth and power. When all religions were thus considered equally worthy of contempt, the sole object of the apologist was to defend Christianity. He was quite willing to toss all other religions to the wolves. The differences between Christianity and other religions were accentuated. To be a good Christian it was thought as necessary to believe that other religions were from the devil as to believe that ours was from God. Carlyle did not exaggerate when he said that the general opinion, so recently as in his own day, was that Mohammed, for instance, "was simply a scheming impostor and his religion a miserable piece of spiritual legerdemain." But there is a truer philosophy now respecting religion, and a truer view of man's relation to a universal moral order. Religion is admitted to have its basis in the truth of things. Man being made in the image of God, faith must be the highest energy of his spirit—that by which he lays hold on God and so raises himself above the limitations of time and sense and his own egoism. The apologist has, therefore, a nobler function than to point out, as Bishop Butler well did in his day, that there are the same difficulties in the system of nature as in religion. He seeks rather to show that religion offers a solution to the

proble
to disp betwee
and to
is wait sidered
which stitutio is to a
and th
merely ness or tive, a nature
who, w
God of
of this other r partial
in the
we can such co
the wor
fully.
form of essentia
and Co between montan
montan
reason oracles, ing to F
of reaso God.
plemen
reason, through is the k

gions by their
to judge of the s morality from ligion we must the mind of its too often is, try ck-room rather cils of priests."
cessary point of h, however, very tain more than nsidered all re-cy of statesmen ignorance and of securing an
th and power.
ually worthy of
was to defend toss all other between Christ-ted. To be a sary to believe as to believe not exaggerate recently as in instance, "was on a miserable here is a truer a truer view of
r. Religion is things. Man
h must be the h he lays hold e limitations of e apologist has,
out, as Bishop
the same diffi-pn. He seeks olution to the problems and difficulties of nature; and his object is not to disparage any religion or to accentuate the differences between them, but to discover the points of agreement and to find a common need which one common element is waiting to supply. But, when all religions are considered legitimate products of that faith in the unseen which is recognised as an essential part of man's constitution, the tendency, on the part of hasty generalisers, is to assume that Christianity can have no special claim, and that the differences between it and other religions are merely accidental. It is even thought a sign of narrowness or intolerance to assert that Christianity is distinctive, and that it has its root not only in the spiritual nature of man, but also in a Special Revelation from God, who, when man had fallen into sin, revealed Himself as a God of grace. The true way, however, to meet criticism of this kind is not by taking up a pharisaic attitude towards other religions, but by instituting a thorough and impartial examination and comparison of all. We believe in the superiority of Christianity to other religions, but we cannot entertain this belief intelligently until after such comparison. For the first time in the history of the world, too, we are enabled to undertake it successfully. There is no great religion, the content and the form of which we cannot now study. The content or its essential ideas must be tested by the universal Reason and Conscience. Here, the true path is in the middle, between the two extremes of what may be called Ultramontaniam and Rationalism. According to Ultramontaniam, revelation is the opposite of reason, and reason must bow in helpless submission before divine oracles, without presuming to understand them. According to Rationalism, revelation is simply a natural evolution of reason, and no special revelation has ever been given by God. According to Christianity, revelation is the complement of reason. The essential identity of human reason, so far as it goes, with the divine is implied all through the Bible, and we can trace in a history, which is the key to universal history, a special revelation or the unfolding of the depths of the divine nature to meet the special need of man. Only when this revelation has been made are men able to see its reasonableness and its fitness to be the religion of the world. It then becomes the standard by which we may compare other religions. In order to know what reason of itself can discover and can do, apart from this special revelation, we have only to go back to pre-Christian times, and to lands outside of Christendom, and study their religions and histories. We must, however, take a genial and not a hostile spirit to this study. Our religion will then be seen to be the best friend of all the others. It will vindicate the good that is in them and their gropings after light. It will offer a reconciling element to bring completeness to each and harmony among all. This will be its noblest Apology. The form as well as the content of religions must be studied comparatively; their sacred books according to the accepted laws of critical scholarship, and the institutions and societies in which their ideas are enshrined also according to rules that have universal validity. In this study of form we must accept the results of the application of rules and principles as readily, in the case of Christianity, as in the case of every other religion. The Holy Scriptures as literature cannot be exempted from the rules that we apply to the Koran, the Vedas, the Tripitaka, or the Shoo or Shih King. It may be noted, too, that nothing but good can come from this study in every case. The object of criticism is constructive, not destructive. It endeavours to set each book before us in the light in which it appeared to those for whom it was originally written. It seeks to distinguish between the original utterances of inspired men and "the after-thoughts, generally the corruptions of later ages," between the living words of the prophet and the work of the compiler and the scribe. Similarly, the real meaning and value of institutions can be known only when they are traced back to their origins, and a civilisation can be valued aright only when, by

comp
duly a Wh Testar
witness questio must r tiles in to the
which would rally e stood or car excited the pro
the Sc
of Jesu have e Testar
they h
with e their extend for the
to und forgive proph
not un
of Jeh
round
truth.
reflect put ba to min the Is
bours,
is the exile s

comparison with others, its conditions and defects are duly acknowledged, and the law of its life is discerned.

What was the point of view from which the Old Testament prophets and Jesus—to whom the prophets witnessed—regarded the religions of the world? No question can be more important. In answering it, we must not judge by the attitude of the Jews to the Gentiles in the time of Jesus, for that was in direct opposition to the spirit of the prophets, and of the Scriptures in which their words were recorded. The Jews themselves would not have admitted any such opposition. Naturally enough, learned Rabbis thought that they understood their own Scriptures, and the idea that a peasant or carpenter from Galilee understood them better only excited their ridicule. They knew and loved the law and the prophets. They gloried in their fidelity to Moses and the Scriptures, and they believed that it was the attitude of Jesus that was unscriptural. Christians, unfortunately, have either assumed that their interpretation of the Old Testament was correct, and have made it their own, or they have condemned the Jews and especially the scribes with excessive harshness. We should remember that their attitude was the result of historical conditions, extending as far back as the exile in Babylon, and that for these full allowance must be made. We must try to understand the conditions, for to understand is to forgive. In the fifth century before Christ men of prophetic spirit saw that Israel had fallen, through not understanding the difference between the character of Jehovah and the characters of the gods of the nations round about. Jehovah was essentially righteousness and truth. The gods of the heathen were largely mere reflections of the evil passions of their worshippers. To put both on the same plane and worship them alike was to mingle the true and the false together. Doing this, the Israelites had become as morally vile as their neighbours, probably more so, for the corruption of the best is the worst form of corruption. The prophets of the exile saw this, and Ezra, the scribe, as well as his fellow-labourer, Nehemiah, the civil governor, saw that the only hope for Israel was to separate the returned exiles rigidly, according to the commandments of the law, from the filthiness of the surrounding peoples. This policy was required at the time, though there were not wanting men who opposed it, on the ground that it was contrary to the spirit of the fundamental covenant that Jehovah had made with Israel, and to the teaching of the great prophets. Each age, however, has its own work to do, and statesmen are obliged to take up the position that their own time demands. Events tended to harden and sharpen the policy of Ezra, and to accentuate the lofty sense which the Jews came to entertain of their own superiority and their privileges as the people of Jehovah. The truth of their election by God for the sake of the world became perverted into the falsehood of an election of favouritism for their own sakes. The Messianic hope became degraded in the same way. The terrible Maccabean struggle, in the second century before Christ, gave the greatest impetus to this evil tendency. In consequence, a bitter hatred, or a haughty and pharisaic contempt of other nations and religions, took the place of the spirit that had animated Abraham, Moses and Isaiah. "Uncircumcised dogs," "Sinners of the Gentiles," and such like, were the names invariably given to other nations, and it was assumed that God had revealed Himself to no people but to Israel. The teaching and attitude of Jesus was a continual and emphatic protest against this essentially irreligious spirit. He, the Messiah, was the true successor and fulfiller of the prophets of the elder day, while he transcended the nationalism within which the greatest of them had of necessity to move, and by which they were trammelled in their eagle flights. He had, only in larger measure, the spirit of Amos, who told Israel that Jehovah had brought other nations to their lands in the same way in which He had led themselves out of Egypt; that He had led the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir; and that He would judge Israel and Judah,

for t judge punis great
the s sight
sham remir
being from same
the L ing (C
in the
the s true r Jesus
from
"and
Jacob
king attitu
came Rom
teste
that
that
the C
their funda
fore wors
their
Mast
neliur
of th illum
"Of
respe

saw that the returned exiles of the law, peoples. This there were not and that it was covenant that the teaching of, has its own to take up the Events tended and to accentuate to entertain of the people of God for the the falsehood in sakes. The one way. The century before evil tendency. haughty and religions, took ed Abraham, gs," "Sinners names invari- assumed that but to Israel. continual and religious spirit. and fulfiller of ascended the them had of re trammelled rger measure, Jehovah had the same way ypt; hat He d the Syrians el and Judah, for their sins, by the same moral law by which He judged those nations, with the difference that their punishment would be greater as their light had been greater (Amos ix. 7). Jesus had, only in larger measure, the spirit of Malachi, who asserted the equality in God's sight of all sincere worship, and who, in order to shame the grudging and polluted offerings of the Jews, reminded them that incense and a pure offering was being made to Jehovah by races outside the Jewish pale, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same—"For my name is great among the Gentiles, saith the Lord of hosts." Malachi repeats this remarkable saying (Mal. i. 11-14, Revised Version). The translation in the Authorised Version obscures his thought; but on the same point, that all honest, reverential worship and true morality are acceptable to Jehovah, the language of Jesus is unmistakable. "Many," He says, "shall come from the east and the west," that is, from heathen nations, "and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven, but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness." His attitude to the Samaritans and Gentiles with whom He came in contact, and His recognition of the faith of the Roman centurion and of the heathen woman whom He tested so severely, must have shocked all who believed that true religion was confined to the Jews. To be told that He found greater faith among the heathen than in the Church must have sounded almost as blasphemy in their ears. It was, however, simply the outcome of the fundamental principle, that God is a Spirit, and therefore that all who worship in spirit and in truth are worshipping God. The apostles came gradually to see their relation to other races and religions from their Master's point of view. When Peter heard from Cornelius his straightforward story and looked into the face of the good man, the light flashed into his soul and illuminated much that had previously been dark to him. "Of a truth," he said, "I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is acceptable to him," and straightway he preached Jesus to hearts prepared for Him, by what we would call natural means; and they believed while the masters of Israel rejected Him. It was the conviction of this same truth that made Paul a missionary to the Gentiles, and the model for missionaries to all time. He became a Jew to the Jews, a Greek to the Greeks, and a barbarian to the barbarians. We have only to study his sermons to the people of Lystra and of Athens, and compare them with his sermons in the synagogues, to understand how thoroughly he adapted himself to the needs, the history, and the actual religious condition of the people to whom he preached; how genial was his attitude, and how consistently he operated along the line of least resistance, in seeking to bring men to the Saviour. He saw that Christianity had broken down the middle wall of partition between the nations and opened a universal temple; and when others, even apostles, would have kept the Church as a mere Jewish sect, he, in the spirit of Jesus, made it the religion of humanity.

This, too, is the spirit in which the missionary work of the Church must always be conducted. Something more than zeal to make proselytes is needed. The Pharisees had zeal of that kind, and what Jesus thought of them and their zeal we learn from his words, "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is become so, ye make him twofold more a son of hell than yourselves." Clearly, the only way to understand how we should approach an intelligent man who has been brought up in another faith is by putting ourselves in his place. We would disdain being proselytised, but we are always ready to welcome truth. But, admittedly, no one can benefit us who makes his approaches with an air that plainly says that he knows all truth, and that what we have hitherto believed and acted on is all false. If he comes to us with an assumption of his own superiority and a scarcely concealed contempt for our forefathers, he can never be God's prophet to us. He must take a different

attitu
mon
to fir langu study our p ciate
and if he impa
be as will i a nat must make Prose
little,
gains initia
but c
C
order
truth
bound
and times of ign
by H
by H
man
the C
Him
desp
not such Chri
and
cont
whi

ble to him," prepared for as; and they
 ed Him. It made Paul a for missionthe Jews, a e barbarians.
 e people of his sermons oroughly he d the actual e preached;
 sistently he n seeking to istianity had between the
 when others, as a mere made it the

onary work Something
 ded. The us thought words, "Ye
 , and when re a son of y to under-an who has g ourselves
 sed, but we mittedly, no
 with an air that what else. If he riority and ers, he can a different

attitude altogether. He must stand with us on the common platform of brotherhood. He must take the trouble to find out what we have done. He must speak our language, understand our music, sing our best songs, study our highest literature, honour our past, comprehend our philosophy, sympathise with our ideals, and appreciate the deepest elements in our lives. He must respect and love us. Then, if he is greater than we are, and if he has new truth to communicate or new power to impart, we gladly accept him as leader. Then he will be as the early and latter rains to the roots of life. He will initiate forces potential to leaven the community, and a nation will seem to be born in a day. All societies must be influenced from within. Attacks from without make them more impervious than they were before. Proselytism detaches individuals, who as a rule are worth little, but it arrests internal development. Prophetism gains individuals, who become centres of force, and it thus initiates movements which may be delayed or defeated but cannot be destroyed.

Christendom is God's prophet to the nations. In order to fulfil this high mission we must act on the truth we profess to believe, that He has appointed the bounds of their habitation; that in Him they live, move, and have their being; that He has spoken to them in times past, though, as those were what Paul calls "times of ignorance," the Father's voice was not heard distinctly by His wayward children; and that now, having spoken by His Son, by whom He will judge the world, He commands men everywhere to repent and believe. Presenting the Christ in this spirit we shall see all men drawn unto Him; while we shall never gain those whom we hate or despise, or endeavour to bully or bribe. They would not be our true brothers if they could be won by any such brute methods. We shall never gain the non-Christian nations until we treat their religions with justice, and until courtesy, respect, and love take the place of the contempt which is now so general and the only excuse for which is that it is largely based upon ignorance.

CHAPTER I

MOHAMMEDANISM

Importance of the person of Mohammed in connection with this religion—His birth and character as a youth—Religion of the Arabs at the time—His perception of its falsehood—Intercourse with Christians, Jews, and Hanifs—Influence of the desert on him—General difference between the religious conceptions of Semites and Aryans—Perception by Mohammed that the great reality is God—Crisis of his life when he became convinced that he was called to be a prophet—His revelations—His converts—Persecutions—Crisis in Mecca—The Hijra to Medina—Characteristics of his ten years in that city—Success of his new policy—Sketch of the propagation of his faith from his death to the present day.

MOHAMMEDANISM is the latest born of all the great extant religions. In studying it, there arises before us "the strange spectacle of a religion coming into being in the clear light of day."¹ A man who lived in the sixth Christian century was its founder and the sole author of its Bible. That Bible—the Koran—is only about two-thirds of the length of the New Testament, and its authenticity is unquestioned. Clearly, to know this religion we must know what kind of a man the founder was. He insisted, indeed, as Paul did with regard to Christianity, that it was not a new but an old religion, the religion of their forefathers, of the patriarchs, of the prophets and of Jesus, which he was

¹ Renan's Études d'Histoire Religieuse, p. 230.

preach
them extra corda
then
all th
subm histo
Not
differ
we m

M
year
the K
poor, As a
the d house
the d
and life w
who at le Amin
thoug sessio
life.

T
theis
what place mem
its in 600
a sa
falle stoo
for

preaching, in its final form, to the Arabs, and through them to the world. In this form it proved to have extraordinary power, first by fusing the chaotic and discordant tribes of Arabia into a theocratic nation, and then by displacing Christianity from its cradle and from all the countries known to us as the Bible lands. These submitted without exception to the Crescent. Does history present us with any facts more astonishing? Not to make an attempt to learn their secret shows indifference to all religion, and in order to understand them we must estimate aright the character of Mohammed.

Mohammed was born in Mecca, somewhere about the year of our Lord 571. The tribe to which he belonged was the Koreysh, the noblest in the city, but his family was poor, and he himself was left an orphan at an early age. As a youth he herded sheep, and gathered wild berries in the desert. In his twenty-fifth year he entered the household of a wealthy widow, named Khadijeh, and in the discharge of her business made journeys to Palestine and Syria. Subsequently he married Khadijeh. His life was of such purity, gravity, and integrity that those who knew him best loved and honoured him most, and at length his townspeople gave him the name of El-Amim, the Trusty. He was forty years old before the thought that he was called to be a prophet took possession of him and changed the whole current of his life.

The religion of the Arabs at this period was a polytheistic idolatry, the power of which had died out—save what remained in connection with stated feasts at holy places, to which the tribes had gathered from time immemorial. Mecca was one of those centres. It owed its importance to the Kaaba, or temple, which contained 600 idols, and, more important than any or all of these, a sacred black stone—probably an aerolite—which had fallen from heaven. In the creed of the Arabs there stood, high above all the gods, Allah, the ancient name for the Supreme Being in all branches of the Semitic race. Worship, however, was paid, not to Allah, for man could not enter into relation with him, but to particular deities who dwelt with men, and who were recognised as patrons, respectively, of different families and tribes. Gradually, from observing the often sceptical and irreverent attitude of the people to the gods they professed to serve, and from other reasons, the conviction grew upon Mohammed that the idols that were to be found in every house and in the Kaaba were not gods, and that even the sacred black stone was only a stone. We learn from the Koran of the grief and indignation that were aroused in his soul when he found that the very guardians of the temple, far from believing in the idols, simply used them to delude the people and enrich themselves. But if he gave up the gods of his fathers, what other religion was there? Such a man could not satisfy himself with observance of empty time-honoured forms, and he could not live in peace until he had learned the secret of the wonderful universe of which he was a conscious part.

In his mercantile expeditions to Syria, as well as in Arabia, he had met with Jews and Christians, from whom he heard stories about Moses and the prophets and Jesus. But he was no scholar—it is doubtful whether he could write or even read—and he could not distinguish what was true from what was false. His informants put childish tales from the Talmud on the same level with Old Testament truths, and the character of his knowledge of Christianity may be inferred from the strange notion he entertained that the Trinity consisted of the Father, the Son, and the Virgin Mary. Possibly the Christians whom he met had equally vague notions concerning the fundamentals of their religion. The Christian nations had to a great extent lost sight of the living God. Their faith had evaporated in worship of images, still more in discussions of metaphysical subtleties about God and religious controversies which were splitting the Church into sects and wasting its strength, although there was much clattering activity that looked like

streng
an a Arabs
hidd
never which
to ma
and o griev
truth
was s broug
been
and o indivi recoil count associ but m intelle
will.
The : Jewish
bined.
into t Christ
cetic tarily
of life
prove with t impre secret
for th
trast medit they Chris
that t

strength. God was not in all their thoughts. He was an absentee God, as truly as Allah was to the Arabs, or, what amounted to the same thing, a God hidden by dogmas that pretended to define what can never be defined, though it can be lived. The faith which had conquered the Roman Empire had given way to make-believes, and the inevitable results—worldliness and corruption—could not be hid. In spite of the grievous falling away, Mohammed felt that there was truth in Mosaism and Christianity, and this conviction was strengthened when Waraka, an uncle of his wife, brought him into connection with a movement which had been going on quietly for some time in Mecca, Medina, and other cities of Arabia. In all those centres, isolated individuals were to be found whose moral natures had recoiled from the immoralities and idolatry of their countrymen. Rejecting polytheism and the filthiness associated with it, they not only acknowledged Allah, but made faith in him consist, not in assent to any mere intellectual doctrine, but in Islam, or submission to his will. These men were called Hanifs, or "penitents." The source of this Hanifite movement was probably Jewish Essenism or ascetic Christianity, or both combined. Essenism had spread from the Jordan down into the Arabian desert, and some primitive forms of Christianity were scarcely distinguishable from this ascetic Judaism. Men who prove their sincerity by voluntarily cutting themselves off from the ties and pleasures of life will always influence others, and Bedouin poetry proves that Jewish or Christian anchorites were popular with the Arabs. "It was not their doctrine that proved impressive, but the genuine earnestness of their consecrated life, spent in preparation for the life to come, for the day of judgment, and forming the sharpest contrast to the profanity of heathenism. Ascetic life and meditation were the chief points with the Hanifs also, and they are sometimes called by the same name with the Christian monks. It can hardly be wrong to conclude that these nameless witnesses of the Gospel, unmentioned in Church history, scattered the seed from which sprang the germ of Islam."¹

Mohammed thus came into contact with the Jewish and Christian faiths, along lines where his own nature offered little or no resistance to the new truth. His travels over the great lonely deserts and pastures where Abraham, Moses, and Elijah had wandered, must also have prepared him to feel the power of the fundamental truth of the Unity of God. Nowhere more powerfully than in the desert does nature bring home to the mind the littleness of man and the reality of the Eternal. Nature is "the living garment by which we see God," and in the desert the garment is almost transparent to men of a devout or even an austere turn of mind. "The desert is monotheistic. Sublime in its uniform immensity, it revealed the very first day the idea of the Infinite, but not that thought of fruitful activity which a nature incessantly creative has inspired in the Indo-European mind. . . . Exclusively struck by the unity of government which prevails in the world, the Semites have seen in the development of things only the accomplishment of the will of a Superior Being. God is; God has made the heaven and the earth; behold their whole philosophy. Such is not the conception of that other race, destined to exhaust every phase of life, which, from India to Greece, from Greece to the extremities of the North and West, has made nature animate and divine, from the living statue of Homer to the living vessel of the Scandinavians."² It has been denied that there is this fundamental difference between the religious conceptions of the Semitic and the Aryan peoples, but there is warrant for the position, and it can be successfully maintained. The beautiful, varied, teeming world tended in India and in Greece to obliterate the distinction between the creature and the Creator, either by nature-worship or a philosophical pantheism which took the form of mythologies for the people. To the Semitic

¹ Ency. Brit. See "Mohammedanism," by Professor Wellhausen.

² Renan, The Religions of Antiquity, p. 103.

mind,
measu
near t ing co
to wh
order
there autho
of all that i
and o
To M
and t is no Neith
the h Etern
innum
the flo listen
that f
Jesus-
supers
deces
the p "thei
could the J
to be Moses
were instea
they peopl
and v seemi actual well
1 M

which sprang the Jewish own nature ruth. His
 tures where ered, must the funda-
 ore power-come to the ne Eternal.
 see God," sparent to
 of mind.
 ts uniform
 idea of the vity which the Indo-he unity of e Semites
 the accom-God is ;
 hold their on of that life, which,
 remities of imate and the living enied that e religious oples, but successfully rld tended nction be-by nature-
 took the e Semitic Wellhausen.

mind, on the contrary, there has always been an immeasurable gulf between God and man, and life in or near the desert has had something to do with their reigning conception. God is the great reality, the Sovereign to whom obedience is the supreme duty, the Power who orders all events and guides all history. He is found, therefore, in history rather than in nature. A great authority says, "If I venture to characterise the worship of all the Semitic nations by one word, I would say that it was pre-eminently a worship of God in History ; and of the Aryan race a worship of God in Nature."¹ To Mohammed, at any rate, God became the great fact, and the fear of God made him great. "God ! There is no God but He ! The living, the self-subsisting !
 Neither slumber seizeth Him nor sleep. All that is in the heavens and in the earth is His." This God, the Eternal, had guided the race, speaking to man through innumerable prophets. Mohammed had learned from the floating traditions or stories to which he had greedily listened that there had been 124,000 prophets ; and that five of these—Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and Jesus—had been the bearers of new revelations which superseded all that had been delivered by their predecessors. The last revelation, that of Jesus, had been the purest. "Say ye to the Christians," he cries, "their God and my God is one." He did all he could to induce them to accept him, and to induce the Jews, who were numerous and wealthy in Arabia, to believe that he was "the prophet, like unto Moses," foretold in their Scriptures, unto whom they were to hearken. When they refused to listen, and, instead, mocked him, he promulgated the theory that they had corrupted their sacred books to prevent the people from recognising him, or that spurious versions and various readings of the Scriptures explained any seeming opposition to his claims. An appeal from the actual text to a lost original is still made by Moslem, as well as by some Christian theologians ; by the first for the sake of discrediting, and by the second for the sake of exalting, our Scriptures!

¹ Max Müller, Introduction to the Science of Religion, p. 171.

It is possible, then, to explain how Mohammed acquired a knowledge of the fundamental facts and ideas that he afterwards preached, and why it was that these found ready entrance into his mind. But such an explanation does not explain the rise and power of Mohammedanism. Jews lived in Arabia who knew Moses far better than Mohammed, and Christians who knew the Gospel better. Hanifs had already related essential Biblical ideas to the ancient faith of the people of Arabia, and had built upon that composite foundation a spiritual religion and a life more or less separated from the world. But it was Mohammed, and neither Jew nor Christian nor Hanif, who founded the religion that has once and again threatened to sweep Christianity from the earth, and that still commands the absolute homage of more millions of human beings than are included in all the Protestant churches of the world put together. Where, then, is the secret of Islam to be found?

A distinguished German scholar has hinted that the explanation is to be looked for in the peculiar physical constitution of Mohammed. He was of an exceedingly sensitive temperament. It is also alleged that he had a tendency to see visions, and that he suffered from fits. Let medical men decide whether it was to epilepsy, catalepsy, or hysteria that he was subject, and we shall have in our hands, this scholar would say, the key to the problem of how it was that wife, household, cousin, and slaves all believed him when he declared himself the chosen prophet of God, and how it was that tens of thousands of Arabs—the most bigoted tribesmen in the world—were willing to break, at his command, the sacred ties of blood-relationship and ancestral faith, go with him into exile and to death, and do whatsoever he commanded! No; there have been epileptics and hysterical people before and since, but none of them ever founded a religion. Only in the personality of Mohammed is the explanation to be found.

Person
human witness his be proph
It is w
down, third l he can afterw
proph
explai
when ceeds
and in he can
God.

Wha
life, w
secret
own p God to idolatr can be though above pressed alone, society
At len
month cleft an white withou
gave h
or eve citabili
his ch
finely

Personality is the secret place where God deals with the human spirit, and no one but the man himself can witness as to what has taken place in that region of his being. We may refuse to accept the witness of a prophet, but the witness of history will not be refused. It is writ in large letters, whereas the individual, falling down, but having his eyes open, or caught up into the third heaven—whether in the body or out of the body he cannot tell—hears and sees what, at the best, he can afterwards utter only inarticulately or fragmentarily. No prophet, if he is nothing more than mere man, can explain his own secret. He cannot tell why he fails when he is sure that he must succeed, and why he succeeds when, to the eye of sense, nothing but absolute and irretrievable failure awaits him. In either case he can but bow his head and say, It is the will of God.

What we know of the supreme crisis of Mohammed's life, when the truth took possession of him that the secret of this wonderful universe is God, and that his own place and mission in the universe was to declare God to his countrymen, and call on them to abandon idolatry and sin, and prepare for the judgment of God, can be told briefly. The truths that he had heard, though mixed with Haggadistic stories and legends—above all, the thought of God and a judgment day—pressed upon him. "He used to wander about the hills alone, brooding over these things; he shunned the society of men, and solitude became a passion to him. At length came the crisis. He was spending the sacred months at Mount Hirā, 'a huge barren rock, torn by cleft and hollow ravine, standing out solitary in the full white glare of the desert sun, shadowless, flowerless, without well or rill.' Here, in a cave, Mohammed gave himself up to prayer and fasting. Long months or even years of doubt had increased his nervous excitability. He had had, they say, cataleptic fits during his childhood, and was evidently more delicately and finely constituted than those around him." These were the circumstances in which, according to the tradition of the cave, Mohammed heard a voice say "Cry!"

"What shall I cry?" he answered.¹

"Cry! in the name of thy Lord who created, Created man from blood, Cry! for thy Lord is the bountifullest, Who taught the pen, Taught man what he did not know."

Mohammed arose trembling and went to Khadijeh, and told her what he had heard. She believed in him, soothed his terror, and bade him hope for the future. Yet he could not believe in himself. Was he not mad, or possessed by a devil? Were these voices of a truth from God?

Doubting, wondering, hoping, he had fain put an end to a life which had become intolerable in its changings from the heaven of hope to the hell of despair, when again—some time, we know not how long, after—he heard the voice, "Thou art the messenger of God and I am Gabriel." Then conviction at length seized hold upon him; he was indeed to bring a message of good tidings to the Arabs, the message of God through the angel Gabriel. He went back to Khadijeh, exhausted in mind and body. "Wrap me, wrap me," he said; and in that position the word came to him—

"O thou who art covered, rise up and warn!
And thy Lord magnify!
And thy garments purify!
And abomination shun!
And grant not favours to gain increase!
And thy Lord await."

Thus it was that the first revelations came to Mohammed. He believed that God called him and appointed him to a great work, and obeying the call he became a new man. Thereafter, for ten years in Mecca

¹ It is impossible not to note the similarity of this and Isa. xl. 6.

and th
almost period Disapp
given up ag unity,
necess
were t towns testim
and o
first, b repent ment o
self.
It is sig
own h wise, r
the m
that th
religion Beside
teeth o
its anc part o
that th
would at the offering did inc
began ful kin preach
flock t
man is number sent to the refu

and then for ten years more in Medina, revelations came almost continuously to him. The first decade was his period of trial, and seldom was man more sorely tested. Disappointments, mockery, insults, persecutions were given to him in full measure, but unflinchingly he bore up against everything, and his faith failed not. The unity, spirituality, presence, and power of God, the necessity of righteousness and the certainty of retribution, were truths now so clear to him that he felt that his townsmen must believe, if only he bore true and earnest testimony. He preached to them, therefore, in season and out of season, not attacking their idol-worship at first, but only urging them to worship the one God, to repent of their sins, and to prepare for that great judgment day which was now an ever-present reality to himself. It was in vain. A few converts were made, and it is significant of his sincerity that these were from his own household or relatives or slaves. But not many wise, not many noble, not many mighty were called, and the mass of the people thought him mad, or declared that there was nothing new in his preaching. The religion of their forefathers was good enough for them. Besides, why should they adopt a new religion in the teeth of the city's interests, which would degrade it from its ancient position as the religious capital of a large part of Arabia? If they and others came to believe that the idols of the Kaaba were nothings, no longer would the surrounding tribes come to offer worship and at the same time enrich the city with their alms and offerings. Slowly, however, but steadily, the converts did increase in number, and then the rulers of the city began to persecute all who were not protected by powerful kindred. Accordingly, in the fifth year of his preaching, Mohammed sent away fifteen of his little flock to Abyssinia, "a land of righteousness, wherein no man is wronged." Others followed them, till they numbered more than a hundred. Then the Koreysh sent to demand their extradition. The king called for the refugees, and asked them in a full assembly of bishops,

PLD

tradition of y!"

ed,

Khadijeh,
ed in him,
the future.
e not mad,
of a truthput an end s changings
pair, when after—he God and I eized hold ge of good through the exhausted
" he said;

n!

came to him and the call he s in Mecca

d Isa. xl. 6.

what reason they had to give why they should not be sent back to Mecca. One of them answered—

“O King! we lived in ignorance, idolatry, and unchastity; the strong oppressed the weak; we spoke untruth; we violated the duties of hospitality. Then a prophet arose, one whom we knew from our youth, with whose descent and conduct and good faith and morality we were all well acquainted. He taught us to worship one God, to speak truth, to keep good faith, to assist our relations, to fulfil the rites of hospitality, and to abstain from all things impure, ungodly, unrighteous; and he ordered us to say prayers, to give alms, and to fast. We believed him, and followed him. But our countrymen persecuted us and tortured us, and tried to cause us to forsake our religion. And now we throw ourselves upon thy protection. Wilt not thou protect us?”

And he recited a part of the Koran which spoke of Christ, and the king and the bishops wept upon their beards. And the king dismissed the ambassadors of the Koreysh, and would not give up the refugees.

Thereupon, in Mecca, persecution waxed hotter. Civil war seemed imminent, for now the leaders of the Koreysh made up their minds to crush the new faith, even though they provoked active resistance on the part of those who were compelled by blood-relationship to stand by Mohammed. Old Abū-Tālib, his uncle and the head of the family, who had hitherto protected him without accepting his prophetic mission, dreading the prospect, sent for him and begged him “not to cast upon him a burden heavier than he could bear.” Mohammed was deeply moved. His uncle had always treated him as a son, and the prophet would fain do for him in return all that man could do. But one thing he could not do. To be false to the voice in his soul commanding him to preach God to his countrymen would be deadly sin. “Though they should set the sun on my right hand and the moon on my left to persuade me, yet while God commands me I will not renounce my purpose.”

So sa
from shelte come “Dep for, b Abū-T conve
The g
What
ceede certai
the fa
histor
witho
When
from vited
to the pledge
their fornic sland fairly again
from.
to co
adher new over politi
the s Moh
of th
new worl
place
have anot

So saying he burst into tears, and turned to go forth from the house that he thought was to be no longer his shelter. But Abū-Tālib called, "Son of my brother, come back." And when he came, the old man said, "Depart in peace, my nephew, and say what thou wilt; for, by the Lord, I will never deliver thee up." But Abū-Tālib died soon after. Kadijeh, true wife and first convert, also died. Mecca would have none of Mohammed. The good of the city required that he should perish. What would have been the result had the Koreysh succeeded in putting him to death? This one thing is certain, that had his followers been able to propagate the faith, Mohammed's figure would have stood out in history as that of a prophet and martyr absolutely without reproach. But the Koreysh did not succeed. When the sky of Islam was darkest, a ray of hope shone from an unexpected quarter. Converts in Medina invited him to flee to their city. They came as pilgrims to the annual feast in Mecca, and secretly gave their pledge to him "to have no God but Allah, to withhold their hands from that which was not their own, to flee fornication, not to kill new-born infants, to shun slander, and to obey God's messenger as far as was fairly to be asked." They also swore "to guard him against all that they guarded their wives and children from. He, on the other hand, promised thenceforward to consider himself wholly as one of themselves, and to adhere to their society." According to this pact, the new religion and not blood-relationship, as formerly over Arabia, was to be the foundation of all social and political relations, and this new religion, summed up in the short creed, "There is no God but the Lord, and Mohammed is His apostle," proved sufficient as a solvent of the oldest and strongest bonds and the cement of a new structure that soon challenged the wonder of the world. Mohammed's flight—"Hijra"—to Medina took place on 16th June, 622 A.D. From that date Moslems have ever since counted history. Mohammed lived for another decade; but during this last period of his life he discharged the functions of lawgiver, statesman, general, judge, and king, as well as those of preacher and prophet. His prophetic utterances, too, took a different tone. They were more of the nature of official commands and authoritative decisions on cases submitted to him than the old rapt utterances that broke out from a heart on fire with zeal for God, or the impassioned arguments and appeals that he addressed to the sceptical Meccans. He filled his new rôle, however, with astonishing success, personal influence over his followers proving sufficient to supply his lack of experience or qualifications for government, and sufficient even to hide or atone for personal declensions from old ideals and his own laws. The practical necessities of politics and war modified the high demands of justice, truth, and mercy, on which he had previously insisted so absolutely. And worse, far worse, the man who had laboured and suffered so much for the reformation of others proved, when tested by the possession of absolute power, unable to keep himself pure. Though restricting to four the number of wives the faithful might possess, he himself had at one time in his harem nine wives and two slave-girls. He invoked new revelations from God to sanction his frailty. "In religion there should be neither violence nor constraint," had been his teaching in Mecca; but when he found himself surrounded by resolute swordsmen he attacked the Jews, near Medina, for refusing to acknowledge him, plundered some, and murdered hundreds of others in cold blood. The success of his new policy, however, was startling. His death found the vast peninsula of Arabia almost a unit in obedience to the new faith; and though apostacy then took place on so general a scale that it seemed to be universal, and Medina itself was attacked within a year, Islam was soon re-established as the national religion. It at once spread like wildfire over the greater part of the civilised world. Neither the legions of the Roman Empire nor the hosts of Chosroes, the great king of Persia, could stand before the Arab warriors, who rushed from the deserts to

conve
them
Egyp
across conqu
—Isl
quest
of th physi Centr
home
from Empi
and w a true Mayo
subse tain Europ
be att centu
Land, during equall Islam
medan point invasi Christ
tion f
again
threat
the w
of the time its ho India Africa

convert the unbelieving, and win riches or paradise for themselves. It swept over Palestine, Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Northern Africa, and from Africa it leaped across to Europe and established itself in Spain. The conquered populations were offered the triple option—Islam, the sword, or tribute. When the tide of conquest was at the full a nobler spirit took possession of the conquerors, and science—physical and metaphysical—became distinctive marks of Moslem rule. Centres far apart as Cordova and Baghdad became the homes of letters and art. The Crescent was prevented from penetrating farther into Europe by the new Western Empire, which had established itself under Charlemagne, and which had at its heart a faith as sincere, as well as a truer theology and a purer life. The “hammer” of the Mayor of Paris drove it back beyond the Pyrenees, and subsequently Christian champions appeared in the mountains of Asturias, who drove it foot by foot from Spain. Europe was freed from it on the one side, only to be attacked subsequently on the other side. For two centuries Christendom wrestled with it for the Holy Land, and was finally defeated. A period followed during which the disciples of both faiths seemed almost equally threatened by Tartar hordes; but these accepted Islamism, and, in the fifteenth century, a mighty Mohammedan power took Constantinople by storm, and from that point of vantage swept, in successive resistless waves of invasion, up to the gates of Vienna, and threatened the Christian world. During the struggles of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, Protestantism was saved again and again from being strangled in its cradle by threatened or actual invasions of the Turks, for which the whole strength of the Empire was required. Fear of the Turks was then in every one’s mind. Since that time Islamism has decayed in Europe; but it retains its hold of Central Asia, continues to make progress in India, and fights with Christianity for the possession of Africa.

CHAPTER II

THE CAUSES OF THE SUCCESS AND OF THE DECADENCE OF MOHAMMEDANISM

Inadequate explanations offered of the success of Mohammedanism—The explanation to be found in the personality of Mohammed and the fundamental truths of his teaching—His doctrines of the Sovereignty of God and the duty of submission to Him—His inadequate theology—Necessary failure of attempts to supplement or develop it—His inadequate anthropology—Lessons taught both by the success of Mohammedanism and by its failure—Superiority of the Christian conceptions of God and of man, and consequently of Christian civilisation—Defective estimate of woman by Mohammed—Evil results of this—Answers or pleas of Mohammedan apologists—Rejoinder—A true religion sets before us the highest ideals of character and life—How shall we commend Christianity to Moslems?

I. THE personality of Mohammed kindled into a flame truths held in common by Jews, Christians, and Hanifite Arabs. This mainly accounts for his extraordinary success. To trace its source to a force that is imponderable may be unsatisfactory, but at any rate other explanations that have been given will not bear even a cursory investigation. It has been declared, for instance, by apologists, that Christianity succeeded by appealing to moral forces, whereas Mohammedanism sanctioned the use of the sword, and promised Paradise to all the faithful who died in battle. But Christendom

SU
 did n
 as so
 There
 the c magn
 Saxon
 down
 made again
 are w Cross
 mater under certai
 first c
 The
 this,— gotten ignor discipl
 world
 Ec
 to the allow secur inculc diffic
 which he a religi
 reform
 cond
 and proh
 marr
 as to perio ance
 heir

did not scruple to use all the weapons of the civil power as soon as it was permitted to lay hands upon them. There was a wonderful change in its attitude after the conversion of Constantine. Subsequently, Charlemagne's arms had more to do with the conversion of the Saxons than the preaching of missionaries had. And, down to very recent times, appeal has frequently been made to the Bible for authority to draw the sword against the enemies of God and the Church. Besides, are we to say that those who fought under the sign of the Cross did not believe in Heaven and Hell—often a very material Heaven and Hell—as well as those who fought under the Crescent? On the other hand, it is quite certain that Mohammed won the absolute support of his first converts and swordsmen by first gaining their hearts. The proper question to ask, as Carlyle pointed out, is this,—how did Mohammed get his sword? And when gotten, how did it happen that tribes—chaotic and ignorant—captured strong fortresses, and defeated the disciplined legions of Rome that had conquered the world?

Equally pointless is it to say that Mohammed appealed to the passions of men by sanctioning polygamy, and allowing sexual license in other ways, and that he thus secured followers who would have been repelled had he inculcated a rigid morality. On the contrary, it was difficult at first to make converts because of the restraints which he imposed on them. It is now well known that he appeared to the Arabs as a preacher of spiritual religion and a reformer of abuses, and that his principal reforms were minute and considerate laws affecting the condition of women. "The restrictions of polygamy and recommendation of monogamy, the institution of prohibited degrees against the horrible laxity of Arabian marriages, the limitations of divorce and stringent rules as to the support of divorced women during a certain period by their former husbands, and as to the maintenance of children, the innovation of creating women heirs-at-law, though only to half the value of men, the abolition of the custom which treated a man's widow as a part of his heritable chattels,"—these were reforms as great as the people could then bear. The case of the Thakafites of Táif may be cited as an illustration of the superiority of Islamism to the surrounding heathenism in other matters, and of Mohammed's resolute attitude when he was implored to wink at laxity, even for a little time, and in order to secure a desirable end. After the battle of Honain, the Thakafites sent ambassadors to Medina to offer to do homage to the prophet and accept the faith. They desired, however, that fornication, usury, and wine-drinking should be permitted to them. Mohammed refused, and pointed out that, indispensable as these practices might seem, the Moslems had given them up. The Thakafites next begged that, as a concession to the foolish multitude, the Rabba or Goddess of Táif might be retained for three years, or two years, or one year, or even a month. But Mohammed was resolute, and the only concession he granted them was that they should not be obliged to destroy the Rabba with their own hands, but that he would send men to do that effectually.

The fact is that the invisible force that turned slaves—just escaped from the brickyards of Egypt—into a nation, and gave them victory over giants and over peoples strong in chariots, cavalry, and walled cities, also fused the hordes of the Arabian deserts into a resistless army. Moses, fresh from those deserts two thousand years previously, proclaimed God as Jehovah, the Eternal and Living God, the Sovereign of the World, and also as the God who had spoken to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and had chosen Israel to be His peculiar people. Israel believed and became a nation. The same truth, an apprehension of the highest and deepest reality of existence, took possession of Mohammed. Every fibre of his being responded to it, and the hearts of his followers were kindled by the flame in the prophet's soul. Mohammedanism thus laid hold of a power that the Church in the seventh century was holding feebly, or a

the
He i
the B
Him
wisd
can upon prepa
Israel
of pro
as a comp
Spirit
When
truth
He w Christ
thoug
Again
appar
flesh may b saved every philos
Moha
histor
TH
to m
"Isla
to G missi
ever to su
—bu whic
the t
of sc

or allowing to slip from its grasp. God, the Soul of the Universe, is as truly a Person as I am a Person. He is the Almighty Creator to whom all nature witnesses, the Ruler whose will all history records, the Revealer of Himself to prophets, whose revelations it is man's highest wisdom and happiness to obey, and whose judgments none can escape. Both Judaism and Christianity are based upon this truth. Judaism is the foundation of and the preparation for Christianity. The God-consciousness of Israel expanded under the leadership of a long succession of prophets and psalmists, who interpreted their history as a process of divine education. Christianity gives the complete revelation of God in His Son, and, in the Holy Spirit, power to renew us in the image of the Son. When we substitute anything else for the fundamental truth that God in Christ is our supreme Lord and Master, He will rebuke us and put us to shame. He rebuked Christendom for centuries by means of Mohammed, though Mohammedanism is only "a bastard Christianity." Again and again He has brought to nought things apparently excellent by things that are despised, that no flesh should glory in His presence, and that all power may be seen to be His. In the days of the Judges, He saved Israel by means of the bastard Jephthah, when every one else seemed powerless to save, and the philosophy of religion can find a place for imperfect Mohammed as well as for imperfect Jephthah in the history of the divine education of the race.

The great truth which Mohammed taught with regard to man's duty flowed from his conception of God. "Islam," says Carlyle, "means that we must submit to God, that our whole strength lies in resigned submission to Him, whatsoever He do to us. . . . It has ever been held the highest wisdom for a man, not merely to submit to necessity—necessity will make him submit,—but to know and believe well that the stern thing which necessity had ordered was the wisest, the best, the thing wanted there; to cease his frantic pretension of scanning this great God's world in his small fraction of a brain ; to know that it had verily, though deep beyond his soundings, a just law ; that the soul of it was good ; that his part in it was to conform to the law of the whole, and in devout silence follow that ; not questioning it, obeying it as unquestionable. . . . This is the soul of Islam ; it is properly the soul of Christianity ; for Islam is definable as a confused form of Christianity ; had Christianity not been, neither had it been. Christianity also commands us, before all, to be resigned to God." Christianity does this, and it does more. It also reveals in full-orbed beauty the character of God who commands us to be resigned to Him. "Submission," says Bishop Butler, "is the whole of religion." If so, Mohammed proclaimed the whole of religion. But it is not so. The Bishop states only one side of the truth. If submission were the whole of religion, man would never rise above the condition of a slave. The true religion not only teaches man the duty of submission, but reveals to him the God to whom he is to submit ; reveals the name or character of God in such a way that submission becomes elevated into filial relationship, and filial relationship implies a relative independence that guarantees human progress. In other words, the true religion cultivates in man the elements of fellowship and progress, as well as the element of dependence. The Bishop of Ripon does not exaggerate when he states that while Islamism makes full provision for the element of dependence, it does not provide for either of the other two indispensable elements of religion.¹ Attempts have indeed been made to engraft them on the system. These very attempts prove its incompleteness and its inadequacy to supply the spiritual needs of men. Thus, Mohammedans think and speak of their great prophet as still living and pleading on their behalf with Allah, but they do so in defiance of his own express teaching. They also try to bridge over the awful gulf between the creature and the Creator by their worship of walis or saints. But the Koran condemns

¹ The Permanent Elements of Religion, Bampton Lectures for 1889, p. 131

SU
all s Regu
but t
hand becor heart unites and p suppl doctr supre
but t Moham
matte
into a
was i proph
of th dictat
in hea
divine
dogm variab artific
and s Islam
togeth but n Súfist
pover
So w in the rule i outbu wou
the h
and
heav

all such worship, and puts God afar off from men. Regular hours for prayer are prescribed and observed, but there is no Redeemer or Intercessor to "put His hand upon both," and it is no wonder that prayer becomes a matter of routine which neither comforts the heart with a sense of fellowship with the divine, nor unites to God as the source of ever-new life, inspiration, and progress. The Sûfite movement, too, sought to supply the element of fellowship with God through its doctrine of the divine love, or the duty of loving God supremely, and at last attaining to union with Him; but the movement is alien to the spirit of Islamism. Mohammed always recoiled from every thought, no matter from what quarter suggested, of bringing God into any vital relation with His creation, save that which was implied in His making His will known through prophets. Even that act did not imply the blending of the divine with the human spirit, but simply the dictating of words to the prophet from an original text in heaven, or rather from a book immanent in God as a divine, eternal, and uncreated word, according to the dogma which Mohammedan theologians have almost invariably taught. There is thus only an external and artificial bridge—the Koran—between God and man, and so there is no room for mysticism or Sûfism in Islamism. "Deism and mysticism cannot really go together. . . . The conflict of principles is disguised, but not removed. The Moslem who makes terms with Sûfism thereby gives his own religion a certificate of poverty, and the true Sûfite is a Moslem no more."¹ So with the element of progress. There have been eras in the history of Mohammedanism, in connection with its rule in Spain, Persia, and India, signalised by remarkable outbursts of intellectual life, that looked as if no religion would prove so favourable as it to the development of the human mind. Conquest was followed by progress, and "the new earth that is always the result of a new heaven" was a distinct advance on all that it superseded.

¹ Kuenen, Hibbert Lecture, pp. 49, 50.

M. Renan declares with truth that for five hundred years, from the middle of the eighth to the middle of the thirteenth century, there were not merely great thinkers and scholars in the Moslem world, but that it may even be said that during that time it was superior to the Christian world in intellectual culture. But notwithstanding this, his conclusion and the conclusion of other impartial authorities is that there is no real link between the faith of Islam and the spirit of culture and progress. The remarkable fact that even in the countries where the efflorescence was most luxuriant no permanent tree of knowledge took root, and that no steady development of humanity can be traced, vindicates the apparently harsh conclusion. Its doctrine of a purely transcendent God forbids the fellowship of man with God, and there is no place for the conception of religion as a well of living water in the soul, fertilising it and making all dead things live. "The inspirations of God cannot be claimed for man's art and science, man's songs and implements. He has bestowed inspiration once, and it lies within the covers of a book, and there is no inspiration for the working or for the thinking sons of men, to consecrate thought and dignify art. Man may paint and sing and study and discover; he may explore and explain the wonders of God's works; he may alleviate by his discoveries the burden of life; but it is not by a divinely-given wisdom he has done these things. God takes no delight in such things."¹ How then can Islamism take delight in them? It may be said that Christendom has also sometimes discouraged science and art, and preached the opposition of Reason and Revelation. It is true that certain forms of Christianity have looked coldly on the life and work of this world, and preached "other-worldliness" as the essence of religion; but Kuenen points out that "whereas no serious historian would ever dream of simply identifying Puritanism and Christianity, Wahabism is really Islam itself—Islam, the whole of Islam, and nothing but Islam."

¹ The Permanent Elements of Religion, p. 142.

Th
by the
of Go
its Sov
world Moham
The n
the Ch Church point o quer al
than to world,
nationa
constan ordered and ba escape came F connect Fatherh
settles death in sinks in of help
calm st
works, Persuad
impossi
the im wonder back in is so n points t
than to Durwes
rapid g
of the c

There can be no doubt that the great duty betokened by the term Islam sprang from Mohammed's conception of God. That this world is God's world, that God is its Sovereign, and that man's one place and duty in the world is to be a servant of God, was truth enough for Mohammed. Everything was swallowed up in that. The nation is lost in the Church, and therefore when the Church is not militant it becomes corrupt; for the Church, as well as God, is regarded from an external point of view, and the mission of the Church is to conquer all nations, and fuse them into one society, rather than to elevate, inspire, and develop the soul of the world, while preserving and honouring all individual and national characteristics. Submit to Allah, Mohammed constantly proclaimed. He is the Eternal, who has ordered all things, and predestinated all things, good and bad. He has decreed, and no one can shun or escape His decree. His doctrine of Predestination became Fatalism, as it always does, when not held in connection with the more comprehensive truth of the Fatherhood of God. The one word, Kismet, it is fate, settles everything for the Moslem. Uttering that word, death in battle has no terrors for him, but in peace he sinks into indifference or torpor begotten of the sense of helplessness. Unlike the man in whom dwells the calm strength of faith, he makes no effort. He neither works, resists, nor flees; he does not even murmur. Persuade him, however, that it is God's will that the impossible should be done, and he is ready to attempt the impossible. He can be roused to do the most wonderful deeds. But once the work is done he falls back into inaction. Hence it is that Mohammedanism is so much greater in war than in peace, and that it points to astonishing victories over enemies in arms more than to steady progress in conquests over nature. "A Durwesh ejaculating Allah! and revolving in a series of rapid gyrations until he drops senseless, is an exact image of the course of their history."

2. Every religion must be tested primarily by its conception of God. Here we find the strength and the weakness of Mohammedanism. It borrowed from Judaism and Christianity the divine principle which expresses the highest and deepest reality of existence, and asserted it with such tremendous energy that it swept over the world like a prairie fire. Poor, unfriended, untaught, Mohammed taught a lesson that should never be forgotten. He taught that even the imperfect apprehension of God, if accompanied with sincerity and energy of soul, will accomplish more than a perfect creed professed by numbers, and fortified by all the resources of earth. Old Testament history is one continuous illustration of this lesson of the superiority of the divine to all that man naturally glories in. The Exodus was the victory of slaves over the horses and chariots of Egypt. The conquest of Canaan was the triumph of spiritual force over the height of walls and the bulk of giants. Every deliverance recorded by the prophets of Israel, and reflected on, lovingly and joyfully, by future generations of psalmists, was a fresh illustration of the same lesson. Every triumph, in the course of their marvellous God-guided history, taught Israel that power is in God, and that they who knew His name might confidently put their trust in Him. Then would one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight. And the essential difference between the Old and the New Testament is that, in the New, the name of God is perfectly revealed, revealed—in accordance with the divine method of both Testaments—not in words but in facts, facts that were manifestations of the Person of God's only-begotten Son. Strange that the world should not have seen or should for a moment have lost the meaning of that name, when in the Cross it was spelled out in letters so large that the glare of imperial splendour could not hide it even from a Constantine. But so it was. The Jew refused the guidance of his own prophets who would have led him to the Christ; and the Christian severed the truth of Jesus from life, forgetting that the eternal meaning of

S
His
His
in de
profe
the p
world
migh
that pared only knew this v
man's had t
and t Moham
apost ciples
been t

W is now inadeq fact of the de charac
We ca founda
that re
who e sisted
and su
Man v sacrific
the tru perfect rescue
to turn of God
indeed

His name is that He is the Lord of this world, that His rule extends over it, and that His kingdom is to be in deed as well as in creed, in power and not in barren profession. There was need, then, of a reassertion of the primary confession of both Jew and Christian to a world that was losing its grip of the truth; and what we might reverently call the irony of God is seen in the fact that this was given by one who was only a child compared to the great Fathers of his day, by one who knew only the first letters of the name of God. But what he knew, he made others to know. He was quite sure that this world is God's world, that God is its Sovereign, that man's place in it is to be a servant of God, and that he had this message from God to deliver to his countrymen and to all men. Christendom will fail in attracting Mohammedans until it reasserts this message with apostolic power, and is also as true to the special principles of the religion of Jesus as Mohammedans have been to the truth of the sovereignty of God.

Wonderfully as Mohammedanism succeeded, its failure is now apparent. The explanation is to be found in its inadequate conception of God. It rested on the mere fact of His unity and sovereignty. Having no root in the deeper nature of things, in the secrets of the divine character and the divine order, its decay was inevitable. We can now stand with the Mohammedan on the rock-foundations of his faith and show him the fuller revelation that rests on these—a revelation culminating in a Man who exercised power over nature, but whose glory consisted not in the exercise of this power but in endurance and submission, in meekness and lowliness of heart, a Man who was and is eternally one with God, yet who sacrificed Himself for sinners, because of His insight into the true depths and grandeur of the soul, because of His perfect knowledge that only in love is there power to rescue man from bondage, to save him from sin, and so to turn earth into heaven and the sons of men into sons of God, joint heirs with His Christ. The Koran does indeed describe God as One, spiritual, supreme, compassionate, and holy. But how can God be holy when He does not demand perfect purity from creatures made in His image? His righteousness is not the inflexible righteousness of the Old, much less the more awful righteousness of the New Testament. His love is exhibited in a lenient indulgence to our infirmities, and not in making full provision for our deliverance from their guilt and power. The divine government is dishonoured when forgiveness is made arbitrary, and when the forgiveness of God does not fill us with reverential fear; and the divine character is lowered when sin is pardoned without atonement, and love is seen to be indifferent to its own purity and the righteous demands of its own honour. These defects in the representation of God's character flow from Mohammed's failure to understand the mystery of the Godhead. To him, God is indeed a Person, acting, ruling, and revealing Himself to prophets, but He is only a Sovereign and not the Father. Hence there is no Eternal Son, who mediates between God and His creation, more especially between God and His children on earth, who lays His hand upon both and unites them in the sacred unity of the Holy Spirit. The gulf between God and man is not bridged over by the Incarnation, and there being no Incarnation there is no ministration of the Spirit, and no intimate and constant communion of the soul with God in Christ. There is no provision for bringing man into that filial relation to God which is his natural relationship, or for preserving him in it against the assaults and seductions of the principle and powers of evil. In one word, Mohammed did not attain to the conception of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is the root of all Christian theology, and of all our religious life and spiritual power. The defective morality of Mohammedanism and its proved inadequacy to develop and sustain the highest civilisation spring from this radical weakness. This should teach us how practical is the truth of the Trinity. When that doctrine becomes to us a mere notion about God, it is simply an arithmetical puzzle, and is of as little use as the assertion

of
St
tha sia wit
the
Go Fa
fun kno
Ev
son teac
in a S pat Hin
who
and Spi
non God
inst
offer
able
and grim cert less
E
its c God
but subj acce fello
This
low gam

of the unity of God was to the monotheists whom St. James ridicules. Jesus never presented the truth in that way. He formulated neither Nicene nor Athanasian Creed. When He declares His own essential union with God, it is in order that His disciples might see, in the divine fact, the truth regarding their own relation to God. He sets forth that relationship under the figure of Fatherhood, because the fact of Fatherhood is primary, fundamental, and universal. Every man, being a son, knows something of what is involved in fatherhood. Every father knows that his deepest longing is that his son should be like that which is highest in himself. Jesus teaches that so it is with God the Father. His object in revealing the Father and His oneness with Him as a Son is that our characters may be assimilated to the pattern of things in the heavens which He Himself is. He Himself is thus Christianity, and the Christian is one who knows that God in Christ lived and died for him, and that God in Christ now lives in him through the Spirit. If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His. But Mohammedanism knows nothing of God for us or of God in us. It has no Cross, and instead of the Person of Jesus and the Spirit of Jesus it offers only an imperfect book. The book is an unalterable code, suited in a very remarkable degree for Arabs and for those in other countries who can make the pilgrimage to Mecca and observe the fast of Ramzân, but certainly not suited for all men and all lands, and still less for all time.

Every religion must be tested, in the second place, by its conception of man, and an inadequate conception of God necessarily tells upon this. If God is a Sovereign but not a Father, man or woman can be, at the best, a subject or servant, not a child. Dependence on God is accentuated, but adequate provision is made neither for fellowship with God nor for human dignity and progress. This imperfection is seen most clearly in Mohammed's low estimate of woman, and in the relations of polygamy, divorce, and servile concubinage which the

Koran established between the sexes. In the account of Creation in Holy Scripture, a striking story reveals how close and sacred are the relations between man and woman. These have been still further sanctified by Christianity. Jesus, in condemning the law of divorce given by Moses, is careful to go back to an earlier law, written in the constitution of things, and to assert monogamy as of universal obligation. Man can never rise to his true height when this primary and fundamental relation between the sexes is not understood and guarded. Civilisation cannot be permanent if it is not based on a pure family life. It cannot reach the highest point, if one-half of humanity is not allowed its due share in social life. It can have no true refinement if there is no faith in the innate purity of womanhood. "A religion that does not purify the home cannot regenerate the race; one that depraves the home is certain to deprave humanity. Motherhood is to be sacred if manhood is to be honourable. Spoil the wife of sanctity, and for the man the sanctities of life have perished. And so it has been with Islam. It has reformed and lifted savage tribes; it has depraved and barbarised civilised nations. At the root of its fairest culture a worm has ever lived that has caused its blossoms soon to wither and die. Were Mohammed the hope of man, then his state were hopeless; before him could only be retrogression, tyranny, and despair."¹ Servile concubinage and facility of divorce, as well as polygamy, tend to the degradation of family life; and the effect of Mohammed's law forbidding women to appear unveiled before any member of the other sex (very near relatives, slaves, and children excepted) is to withdraw them from the social circle, and to make the highest forms of society impossible. When we think of the part played by women in the religious and philanthropic life and work of Christian countries, in our amusements, in education, art, literature, politics, and every department of society, we can imagine what their total withdrawal would mean. A religion that treats woman not as the helpmeet, but as the slave or plaything of man, cannot be permanent. It must pass away. It cannot permanently exist side by side with Christianity. It is at war with the fundamental principles, tendencies, and customs of modern life, and with all that is best and purest in the heart of humanity. As regards woman, Mohammed raised her status in Arabia and reformed the old laws regarding her, and therefore, instead of censuring, we must praise him; but no religion save that of Christ teaches her ideal position in the family and vindicates her place in the social scale.

¹ Principal Fairbairn, The City of God, p. 97.

What plea do advocates of Mohammedanism offer in answer to this argument? They urge the precedent of Jewish polygamy, and point to the terrible "social evil" in every city of Christendom which exists as a result of inexorable monogamy, and claim that on the whole things are better in Mohammedan than in Christian countries. Our answer to this is that the Christian ideal is the true one; that in proportion as Christians rise towards their ideal, the higher form of society, which is the result of Christianity, will become universal; whereas the Koran has affixed a permanent brand of inferiority on all women, and so lowered the level of morality, of purity, of domestic life, and of society. This is our answer, also, when they point to the intemperance found in Christian lands, which contrasts so unfavourably with the abstinence from wine and strong drink secured by the law of prohibition in the Koran. We again maintain that the Christian ideal is the higher; that, admirable as is the general sobriety which prevails in Mohammedan countries and which contrasts so favourably with the drinking customs of some Christian lands, still the sobriety resulting from an internal principle, which distinguishes between the use and the abuse of things indifferent, or abstinence springing from a self-sacrificing regard for weaker brethren, is a far higher thing than the negative virtue secured by external law. Christianity forbids what is sinful, no matter how great the frailty of man may be. In such matters it will concede nothing to alleged weakness. It commands men to rise to its standard; it offers the powers of the world to come to enable them to rise; and it promises unspeakable blessings as the reward of obedience. With regard to what is not in itself sinful, but only dangerous, and therefore inexpedient in certain circumstances, places, or times, its position is different. It declines to take the short cut which Mohammed and Gautama both took, and which is so fascinating still to those who are swayed by their emotions. It throws upon us the responsibility of distinguishing when we should and when we should not abstain, and so makes abstinence moral and not merely mechanical; while by its all-embracing principle, that whatsoever we do, whether we eat or drink, we are to do all to the glory of God, it elevates every detail of life to the dignity of a moral discipline, and so makes the whole of life divine.

How shall we commend Christianity to Moslems?

We must act along the lines of least resistance. These are suggested to us by Mohammed's attitude to the Old and New Testament Scriptures. He held these to be of divine authority, and therefore, though he himself knew only fragments of them, he commanded his followers to believe them. The favour of God is promised to all who believe in the complete revelation of His will, and those who disbelieve any part thereof are "the real infidels." Sir William Muir has brought together all the passages in the Koran in which reference is made to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, with the result of showing that the Bible is invariably mentioned as from God. Here, then, is the door by which we should enter in, in dealing with Moslems. We can approach them in the spirit of brotherhood, as men having a common heritage. We can show to all who are reasonable and who appreciate the principles and methods of modern criticism that there is the fullest proof for the accuracy of our Scriptures—better proof, indeed, than for any other ancient documents. The Koran commands the faithful to accept the testimony of these Scriptures, and they can refuse to do so only at the peril of their salvation. Once they are brought to an intelligent study of them, who can doubt the result? All that they value in the Koran they will find more powerfully stated in the Old and New Testaments; and they will find more. The Koran may thus be used to lead earnest seekers to the Lord Jesus, whom Mohammed himself, we may well believe, would have acknowledged as his Lord, had he only known Him as we know Him.

By this method we may hope to reach individuals. But organised Mohammedanism will remain, until organised Christendom reflects the spirit of Christ—in peace and in war, in political, social, industrial, economic, and domestic life, in its art, science, press, and literature, in its civil and criminal codes, in its international dealings, and in a Church so filled with the Spirit that it shall rise above dead issues, and do the work of to-day; rise above the sectarianisms that exhaust its strength, and go forward as one body to make the kingdoms of this world the kingdoms of God and His Christ.

CHAPTER III

CONFUCIANISM

Birth of Confucius in the sixth century, B.C.—Importance of that century for India, Greece, Judæa, and China—Antiquity and greatness of the Chinese people—Significance of their history to Confucius and of Confucius to them—His unique greatness—Parentage and marriage—Nature of his work as a teacher—Estimate of him by disciples and subsequent generations—Condition of the country in his time—Early religion of China—The ideal of Confucius—His study of the past—His conclusions therefrom—Worship of Heaven by the Emperor and of ancestors by all—The social relations—Reciprocity—Propriety—Confucius' visit to the capital—Interviews with Lao-Tse—His experience as an administrator—Retirement from office—Nobility of his life—His views of the life of a recluse—Return to his native state—Completion of his work—His death.

KUNG-FOO-TSE, or Kung the master, whose name the Jesuit missionaries Latinised into Confucius, was born 551 B.C., that is, in the middle of a century the most notable in the history of the world, with the exception of the one made memorable for all lands by the appearing, in the fulness of the times, of our Lord and Saviour. The sixth century before Christ gave birth in India to Gautama, the Buddha, whose religion is by some authorities declared to number more adherents than any other; and, in Greece (where another division of the same Aryan race found its home), to Aeschylus, the first of a great prophetic line, and Pythagoras, the father of social philosophy. In Judæa, the same century saw the tru Jen

dis
fro
to
the illu Ez
wh
is exi
Ba
the
of hin Jev
and has cen
and of t
of reb
wit
che du

his
bu
inf ver
me po
wh
th

th Ar
tin

importance and China—people—Sig-of Confucius
 e and mar-
 —Estimate
 erations—
 religion of
 of the past Heaven by social rela-
 visit to the erience as
 —Nobility
 —Return to is death.

ose name Confucius,
 a century
 with the lands by our Lord ave birth ion is by ents than on of the
 the first father of saw the true religion apparently destroyed by the capture of Jerusalem and the deportation of the people to far distant northern and eastern lands; and it also heard from Jeremiah that the destruction was only preparatory to a resurrection. It witnessed both the death and the resurrection of the religion of Jehovah. It was illuminated by the great personalities of Jeremiah and Ezekiel; by the work of Cyrus, the heathen Messiah, whose attitude towards the worshippers of Jehovah is a striking proof of the sympathetic relations which existed between them and the Persian conquerors of Babylon; and—in anticipation of and connection with the mission of Cyrus—by the great light of the prophets of the Exile, especially by the imperishable strains of him whose writings were, by a sound instinct of the Jewish scribes, bound up with those of Isaiah of Jerusalem, and who, by as sound an instinct of the Christian heart, has been named “the Evangelical prophet.” The same century that had heard Jeremiah mourning in Jerusalem, and Ezekiel by the banks of the Chebar, and the loud cry of the prophets in Babylon who “comforted” the people of Jehovah, also saw the return of the exiles and the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and heard the hopeful words with which Haggai and Zechariah and nameless psalmists cheered the desponding Church and urged upon it the duty of completing the temple.

The same century was the most notable in the long history of China. It produced not only Kung-Foo-Tse but also Lao-Tse, a man of greater speculative, though of infinitely less constructive ability, the subsequent perversion of whose teaching is an instructive warning that mere speculations about the Unseen, in the absence of positive revelation, take no hold upon the educated, while they degenerate into gross superstitions among the masses of the people.

Thousands of years before Christ, the ancestors of the Chinese wandered eastward from Central or Western Asia. Their own history describes them as, at that time, hunters, who lived without houses, without clothing, and without fire to dress their food. After weary journeyings through deserts and forests, they reached the northern bend of the Yellow River in latitude 41° , and entered on "the Garden of China." Here they founded what is still known as "the Middle Kingdom," and gradually driving the aboriginal inhabitants into the mountains or the sea they became the most powerful nation of Eastern Asia. We are accustomed to think of China as one and the same during the millenniums that have since passed away, but that is simply because of our ignorance of its history. All colours are the same in the dark. The truth is that society is ever changing. It is impossible to get anything like a proper conception of China, if we assume that it has always been what it is now. China has, indeed, solved the problem of unification to a wonderful extent, but for many centuries it consisted of different kingdoms and races, with different laws, languages, and institutions, waging war, too, upon one another as relentlessly as the kingdoms of the Heptarchy in England, or the different parts of France, Italy, and Germany warred with each other or with common foes. China was a world in itself, just as St. Luke called the Roman Empire "the world." He had no idea that there was another and older civilisation far beyond the Roman Empire, whose historians wrote of it as the whole world with the same good faith with which he applied the term to the only world known to him. China is to-day more populous than Europe, and succeeds in maintaining order with a smaller army than that of any one of the great powers of Europe. From its size, population, and range of climate, it should be regarded as a continent, and the chief reason why it is not is that Confucius, twenty-four centuries ago, compiled a series of classics, the acceptance of which stamped on the people a common character, with common customs and ideals, that have made China really one country. The nation had existed for thousands of years previously to his time, for the Shoo King, or Book of History, which he edited, begins as far back as 2356 B.C. At that point, Confucius was able to get beyond the misty annals of a world long lost, the fabulous accounts of prehistoric times—which, however, many educated Chinamen still accept,—and to stand on comparatively firm ground. In the records of the historic past, he found all the guidance that was necessary for the preservation and prosperity of the state. Believing in and loving the ancients, he studied during the whole of his life the records of their sayings and doings. He was a student, canonist, scribe and historian, rather than a prophet or poet; in his own words, “a transmitter, not a maker.” While his system included all that he thought valuable in the ancient history and religion of China, his own reflections, even his limitations, modified and gave unity to the long development. Hence his system came to be accepted by the people as having the stamp of absolute truth and finality. It may almost be said that, to know China, it is necessary only to study the life and work of Confucius. In his voice, as through one of nature’s cunningly constructed shells, we still hear the multitudinous throbbings of a sea of four hundred millions of human beings. To this day, when a Chinaman wishes to pay the highest possible compliment to the greatest benefactor he has ever had or the best person he has ever known, he can go no further than say, “That man is almost as good as Confucius.”

“There is,” declared the official representative of China, in 1893, in Chicago, “only a single person who is venerated as the teacher for all generations and in all human attainments, and he is Confucius.” And, “in order to conceive of the service of Confucius to mankind we can only compare it to that of Heaven and earth.” Is there anywhere else in the world a similar position accorded to one who was a mere man, and who did not even lay claim to having a revelation from God? Jesus declared himself to be the Son of the Highest, and His followers admit the claim. No wonder, then, that they worship Him. Mohammed believed himself inspired and Mohammedans are sure that he was, and they regard him, in spite of the teaching of the Koran, as still mighty with Allah. No wonder that they reverence him above all other men. Gautama Buddha gave a spiritual interpretation of the universe, which his followers accept as authoritative Revelation. We can, therefore, easily understand why the outstanding features of their religion should still be his benign figure and the hopes associated with his lofty titles. But Confucius was only a man, inferior, in his own estimation, to the master minds, who in former ages civilised the people by instructing them how to live in conformity to the divine laws of nature, and who, therefore, were credited with originality or with having received revelations from Heaven, while he was only their humble student and imitator. Yet, while the ancient kings and sages whose names and services he celebrated are forgotten, he has swayed the minds of countless millions. A people, who have ceased to worship God, worship him. His descendants are the only hereditary nobility in the land. Their honours, pensions, and privileges have been respected in all the revolutions that have swept over China since his day. The poor revere his name, for the poorest labourer knows that if his son should outstrip his competitors in mastering the classics of Confucius, he may become Prime Minister of the greatest empire in the world. The Mandarins honour him as the master to whom they owe everything. In every city, down to those of the third rank, there is a temple dedicated to him, in which the learned and great, up to the Emperor himself, offer him religious service. This consists in burning scented gums, frankincense and tapers of sandal wood, and in placing fruit, wine and flowers before a tablet on which is inscribed, "O Confucius, our revered master, let thy spiritual part descend and be pleased with this our respect which we now humbly offer to thee." The service is the same as that which every man is enjoined to pay to his departed parents. Confucius is thus recognised as the father of the whole people and—though only a man—as in some way greater than man.

now
emi
in C
year
old,
the
adv
Chi
year
He
of how mas
cong
so g
to h
of th
upor ables acco
in w origi
that tain
rainentir
since it le
and I
unde natu beau
and belo
is p falle
Per

Confucius was born in Loo, a feudal state in what is now the province of Shan-Tung. His father was an eminent military officer of the most distinguished lineage in China. He married a second time, when over seventy years of age, and died when his son was only three years old, leaving his family in poverty, a circumstance which the sage in after life declared to have been greatly to his advantage. Early marriages have always been the rôle in China, and therefore Confucius took a wife when nineteen years of age; but his married life was not a happy one. He was appointed to different public situations, the duties of which he discharged with efficiency. Finding, however, the work of a teacher—that is, not a school-master, but an instructor of inquiring young men—more congenial, he gave himself up to it, and his fame became so great that earnest students were gradually attracted to him, until they numbered thousands. The character of the man may be judged by the impression he made upon these disciples. Many of them were among the ablest men in China of their time, “superior men,” according to the common Chinese phrase, men mighty in word and deed; yet it was with these that the practice originated of speaking of Confucius as the greatest man that had ever lived, like a phoenix among birds, a mountain among ant-hills, and rivers and seas compared with rain-pools. “He had gained their hearts and won their entire admiration. They began the pæan which has since resounded through all the intervening ages, nor is it less loud and confident now than it was nearly four and twenty centuries ago.”

In order to do justice to him, we must try to understand the condition of China in his day and the nature of the work to which he devoted himself. The beautiful land was torn by discord, harassed by quacks, and desolated by almost continuous war. Mencius, who belonged to the third generation of his disciples, and who is perhaps the greatest of them, says, “The world had fallen into decay, and right principles had disappeared. Perverse discourses and oppressive deeds were waxen rife. Ministers murdered their rulers and sons their fathers. Confucius was frightened by what he saw, and he undertook the work of reformation."

Every one seeks a royal road to success when faith wanes and the old foundations of society give way. Professor Legge proves¹ by a study of the primitive characters and ideograms of China that its religion originally was a vague monotheism. Round the worship of God or Shang-Ti there grew up an inferior worship of multitudinous spirits, who were supposed to preside over the hills, the rivers, the forests, and other objects in nature, and to all of whom sacrifices were offered. A system of superstitious divination, with the object of predicting future events, especially of ascertaining whether proposed undertakings would be fortunate or unfortunate, was also of early origin; and when the ordinary mainstays of society are relaxed, pretenders to supernatural knowledge and power are sure to abound. "The time will come," remarked a sceptic to a philosopher, "when men will no more believe in God than they now believe in ghosts." "Should that time come," was the rejoinder, "they will begin again to believe in ghosts." The Chinese had no clear or sure knowledge of God, and genuine religious ideas had little operative influence upon them. They are naturally a utilitarian rather than a devout people. In the ancient division of the community (given in the Shoo King as existing in the twelfth century B.C.) there is no indication of a priesthood. There were only the official or cultured class, the husbandmen or farmers, the mechanics or workers, and the traders or merchants. No regular provision being made for the religious side of their nature, the people became addicted to fantastic and gross superstitions, and, in times such as those in which Confucius lived, these multiplied, and charlatans made gains out of the fears and miseries of the people. To the truthful nature of Confucius, insincerity and pretension of all kinds were abhorrent. He knew nothing, and therefore would not

¹ Religions of China, pp. 6-58.

pret
His
as a
office
of t wisd
past
the
the paci
wise refus sligh
powe
"the Pien
It is
else,
has,
foreign great
In
think Confu
the re
about spirit
atten best cann
how
"W
about
up lo in li dicta
to d is wh one

sons their he saw, and

ccess when society give udy of the ina that its
m. Round
p an inferior supposed to
, and other
sacrifices were on, with the
of ascertain-be fortunate d when the pretenders to e to abound.
to a philo-ve in God
ld that time in again to lear or sure as had little rally a utili-
ent division s existing in of a priest-
ured class,
or workers,
vision being the people
perstitions,
cius lived,
out of the hful nature kinds were would not pretend to teach anything, about the supersensible world. His deeply-rooted conservative instincts, which he had as a Chinaman, an aristocrat, and the son of a military officer, made him seek a refuge from the convulsions of the present, as well as a remedy for them, in the wisdom, the settled order, and the institutions of the past. A stable and peaceful society seemed to him the one thing needful. To secure the regulation of the family, the government of the nation, and the pacification of the world was his ideal, and, though too wise to oppose himself violently to popular delusions, he refused to be drawn aside by them or to give them the slightest encouragement. Very wonderful has been the power over the national mind of the ideal of Confucius, "the ideal of a united and peaceful empire—p'ing pien hsia, 'to pacify all under Heaven'" (Candlin). It is not too much to say that it, more than anything else, has been the secret of that marvellous unity which has, again and again, enabled China to triumph over foreign conquest and domestic faction, and reassert her great and impressive unity.

In aiming at this ideal, with which every Christian who thinks of the angels' song at Bethlehem must sympathise, Confucius planted himself on the laws of human nature and the relations and duties of life. He eschewed conversation about "extraordinary things," that is, matters dealing with spirits or the supernatural world, though he made no attempt to suppress superstition, believing that it was best combated by taking no notice of its excesses. "We cannot as yet," said he, "perform our duties to men; how can we perform our duties to spirits?" Again, "We know not as yet about life; how can we know about death?" "My prayers," said he, "were offered up long ago." He thus hinted that his prayers consisted in living a virtuous life and in constantly obeying the dictates of conscience, and that prayers are of no avail to deliver any one from sickness. We know that this is what he meant because the words were uttered when one of his disciples, Tse-Kung, had asked leave to pray for him when he was ill, and had quoted from a book of prayers to the effect that prayer might be made to the spirits of Heaven and earth. "He who sins against Heaven," he said on another occasion, "has no place to pray." He meant that spirits have no power to bestow blessings on those who had sinned against the decrees of Heaven. Again, "For a man to sacrifice to a spirit which does not belong to him is mere flattery." He meant that all men should worship the spirits of their ancestors, but that to go beyond the circle of one's family, and worship even departed great ones, was simply flattery and wholly unauthorised.

The great object of Confucius was to bring back again the golden age of the past, when the kings of China loved virtue and the people listened to their instructions, imitated their examples, and observed the rules of propriety attached by nature and the words of the wise to every station and relation of life. He believed in the supreme value of law, of custom, of institutions, and of example. He therefore gave himself to an earnest study of the past and taught his disciples to imitate him continually in this devotion to study. Here are some of his own words :—

"I was not born a man of knowledge ; I am naturally only quick to search out the truth, from a love for the wisdom of the ancients."

"I am not presumptuous enough to set up for a wise and benevolent man. It can be said of me, however, that I am not weary in well-doing, and that I am untiring in teaching others."

"I have gone all day without food and all night without sleep in order to think ; I find it unprofitable, however, and look upon study as preferable."

"I complain not of Heaven nor find fault with men. My aim is to learn from things below and rise to things above. It is Heaven alone that truly knows me."

"Even in a community consisting only of ten houses, among the inhabitants thereof, it cannot be but there are individuals whose sincerity of purpose and love of

truth
of the

of the thought
not corn

there any not have caus

study
not to capric
love of di blind
not to rebel
the le

W
to, as past

F

conce
both
but mean
their consi
the e famil
in Ch
keyst
up ev

from a book
 be made to sins against as no place
 o power to against the o sacrifice to re flattery."
 e spirits of cle of one's
 , was simply

bring back he kings of ed to their bserved the he words of
 He believed institutions,
 nself to an disciples to
 udy. Here

am naturally ove for the p for a wise

 e, however,
 am untiring

night with-table, how-

t with men.
 se to things
 me."
 ten houses,
 but there
 nd love of truth are equal to mine ; but it is impossible that any of them can show a greater love for study than I."

"I make it a practice not to open the understanding of those who manifest no zeal, nor to clear the doubts of those who do not appreciate their own confusion of thought. If I point out one corner to any one who does not know how to apply this knowledge to the other three corners, I will not repeat what I have said."

"If there is any virtue that I have not practised ; if there is any study that I have not mastered ; if there is any righteous course of action which I have known and not been able to pursue ; if there is any fault which I have not been able to correct ;—these things are the cause of my sorrow."

"The love of humanity, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its foolishness ; the love of knowledge, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its capriciousness ; the love of truth, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its mischievousness ; the love of directness, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its uncharitableness ; the love of courage, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its rebelliousness ; the love of firmness, not tempered with the love of study, is blind as to its venturesomeness."

What were the main conclusions that Confucius came to, as the result of his zealous study of the records of the past ?

First, that, so far as the worship of Heaven is concerned, it should be performed by the Emperor alone, both for himself and as the representative of the people ; but that all persons, from the Emperor down to the meanest of his subjects, should observe the worship of their ancestors. He thus removed all that we would consider worship far away from the people, and placed the essence of his religious system in the institution of the family. On this point, his teaching has been observed in China from that day to this. It has become the very keystone and cement of society. Filial piety has swallowed up every other form of piety. A man may believe what he likes, may practise what religious observances he likes, but he is not allowed to dishonour his parents while they live and still less when they are dead. The State strictly enjoins filial piety on all, and public sentiment insists upon the observance of what is enjoined. Centuries after Confucius, two other religions, Buddhism and Taouism, received legal toleration and semi-establishment in the country, but even Buddhist and Taouist priests and nuns are not permitted to put themselves outside of the pale of this obligation. They are all alike required to pay their parents proper respect, to offer sacrifices to their ancestors, and to put on mourning for relatives, according to the degree of relationship which they hold to the deceased. Any violation of these provisions by them is liable to be punished with one hundred lashes and a remand to a secular life. The Mohammedans in China also make no scruple of paying homage to their parents and of offering sacrifices to their ancestors, but the Chinese say that Christian converts do not conform to the established practices, although these are in their eyes essentially bound up with filial piety. This is their chief objection to Christianity, and patriotism intensifies it, inasmuch as the missionaries appeal to their ambassadors to protect their converts in violating the laws. There can be no doubt of the depth and sincerity of Chinese feeling on this matter. You may preach to a crowd, almost anywhere, whatever religious doctrines you please, with little risk of interference or violent interruption; you may even ridicule their idolatry or the superstitious observances connected with every Buddhist and Taouist temple, and if you do it with ability and wit nothing but good-humoured laughter and applause are likely to be evoked, even from those who may be considered most devout; but any attempt to challenge, still less to denounce, the worship of ancestors, will at once be followed by a tumult from which the preacher is not likely to escape scot-free.

Secondly, that man's nature is good, and if followed will invariably lead him right; that Heaven has annexed

its o facu
duty a ri socia Wha
and
and calle
Book
by F years
the fuciu
the wife is su husb sover social fuciu
his p serve subje
is rec deal of fri Confu
rule recip
to yo
the d pract
that.
faile
he w speak true
R

ances he likes, ats while they State strictly iment insists enturies after nd Taoism,
ment in the ests and nuns of the pale quired to pay fices to their es, according hold to the ns by them is ashes and a ans in China their parents
ors, but the not conform are in their
This is their intensifies it,
ambassadors
aws. There y of Chinese to a crowd, s you please,
interruption ;
superstitious and Taoist nothing but likely to be sidered most still less to at once be acher is not if followed has annexed

its own laws to every faculty and relation ; that every faculty has its function to fulfil and every relation its duty to discharge ; and therefore, that the foundation of a right system of thought and life is to define clearly social relations, and to determine the rules of propriety. What are the great social relations? Those of sovereign and subject, husband and wife, parent and child, elder and younger brothers, friend and friend. These five are called the natural relations. They are laid down in the Book of Changes, the diagrams in which were furnished by Fuh-Si, who is supposed to have ruled China 4000 years before Christ, the classical text by Wen-Wang and the great Duke of Chow (who, 500 years before Confucius, founded a dynasty that lasted for 800 years), and the notes by Confucius. The relation of husband and wife is the first of the natural relations ; and as the earth is subservient to Heaven, so must the wife be to the husband, the child to the parent, and the subject to the sovereign. These are "the three mainstays" of the social structure. "A noble-minded man," said Confucius, "has four rules to regulate his conduct : to serve his parents in such a manner as is required of a son ; to serve his sovereign in such a manner as is required of a subject ; to serve his elder brother in such a manner as is required of a younger brother ; to set the example of dealing with his friends in such a manner as is required of friends." An eminent disciple, Tse-Kung, once asked Confucius if there were one word which would serve as a rule of conduct for all life, and he replied, "Is not reciprocity such a word?—What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others." Subsequently, when the disciple told him that he was carrying this rule into practice, he replied, "Tse, you have not attained to that." He confessed on one occasion that he himself failed to do so. Chinese literati say that in so confessing he was only using the language of humility, but he was speaking sincerely, and the language really marks the true greatness of the man.

Reciprocity, according to Confucius, is to regulate not only the five natural relations but all our actions. Kindred are to be treated as kindred, the aged as the aged, the young as the young, the virtuous as the virtuous, —each and all from the standpoint of natural reason which lies at the foundation of education. Elaborate rules to regulate life are laid down in the Book of Rites, which dates from "the three epochs" (that is, the three great dynasties, of which the House of Chow was the latest), and which owes its preservation to Confucius. The one principle at the basis of these rules is "propriety," a word that is final with every Chinaman. The Book of Rites treats of the ceremonies to be observed on attaining majority, and at marriages, funerals, sacrifices, the worship of Heaven, the observance of stated feasts, the sphere of woman, the education of youth, and in one word, at every point and in connection with every fact and department of life. Every detail is fixed, the professed aim being to secure the greatest good and preserve the moral tone of society. Hillel, Shammai, and their disciples—the Scribes and Pharisees of our Lord's day—were not more fully persuaded that men could be made virtuous by law than was Confucius. He believed that, terrible as the times were, he could reform them. "If any one among the princes would employ me," said he, "I would effect something considerable in the course of twelve months, and in three years the Government would be perfected."

For a long time he had no opportunity of putting his principles to the test, but disciples of distinguished families gathered around him and his fame increased greatly, so that when he expressed a desire to visit the capital and to see for himself its temple and the palace, and to study the ceremonies established by the Imperial Court of Chow, the reigning Duke placed a carriage and horses at his disposal for the journey. His veneration for the founders of the dynasty made this visit one of intense interest to him. Another object he had in making it was to confer with the venerable philosopher, Lao-Tse, who held an official position at Chow as keeper of the inter of v your of r Con

Rec
was fucit
"T
"bu
grou
justi
of th
serv dison pige nor itself while troub
"
have Conf
requ
He
hum
and sove
Tse,
hum
stan
The
does
to be
be a
so w no 1
377

our actions. aged as the the virtuous, reason which orate rules to Rites, which e three great ; the latest), s. The one propriety," a The Book of on attaining ces, the wor- ts, the sphere one word, at t and depart- rofessed aim ve the moral r disciples— y—were not ade virtuous that, terrible "If any one e, "I would e of twelve nt would be putting his shed families t greatly, so capital and nd to study l Court of and horses ation for the of intense making it r, Lao-Tse, eper of the Records or Archives. Various accounts are given of the interviews between the two sages, from a comparison of which it would seem that the older considered the younger somewhat pretentious and far too hopeful of reforming his age. On one occasion, Lao-Tse saw Confucius engaged in study and asked what book he was reading. "The Book of Changes," replied Confucius; "the sages of antiquity used to read it also." "The sages were able to read it," answered Lao-Tse; "but you, to what end do you read it? What is the groundwork of the book?" "It treats of humanity and justice," was the answer. "The justice and humanity of the day are no more than empty names; they only serve as a mask to cruelty and trouble the hearts of men; disorder was never more rife than at present. The pigeon does not bathe all day to make itself white, nor does the crow paint itself each morning to make itself black. . . . You are like a man who beats a drum while searching for a truant sheep. Master, you only trouble man's nature."

"In this passage," says Professor Douglas,¹ "we have a clear exposition of the leading differences between Confucius and Lao-Tse. Confucius held that the chief requirement of the age was 'the rectification of names.' He would have men practise humanity, and call it humanity; he would have men dutiful to their parents, and call it filial piety; he would have men serve their sovereign with their whole heart, and call it loyalty. Lao-Tse, on the contrary, held that when men professed to be humane, filial and loyal, it was a sure sign that the substance had disappeared, and that the shadow only remained. The pigeon is not white on account of much bathing, nor does the crow paint itself black. If the pigeon began to bathe itself, and the crow to paint itself, would it not be a sign that they had lost their original colours? And so with men. If all men were humane, filial and loyal, no one would profess these virtues, and they would therefore never be named. And in the same way, if all men were virtuous, the names even of vices would be unknown.

¹ Confucianism and Taoism, by Robert K. Douglas, pp. 28, 177, 182-184.

"No wonder that Confucius searched for twenty years for the Taou of Lao-Tse and found it not. 'If Taou,' said Lao-Tse, 'could be offered to men, there is no one who would not wish to offer it to his prince; if it could be presented to men, there is no one who would not wish to present it to his parents; if it could be announced to men, there is no one who would not wish to announce it to his brethren; if it could be transmitted to men, there is no one who would not wish to transmit it to his children. Why, then, are not you able to acquire it? This is the reason: It is that you are incapable of giving it an asylum in the bottom of your heart.'"

This was a Chinese way of saying that we must be born again, and that law is inadequate for that. Law has its function, but it cannot do the work of the Spirit of God. The Spirit enters only into those hearts which are emptied of self and eager to give Him welcome. Confucius did not find the Taou of Lao-Tse, but neither did Lao-Tse himself. His treatment of Confucius and the utter failure of his own teaching sufficiently indicate that. But he knew human nature too well to believe that salvation was to be found in any external system.

Confucius was puzzled at the attitude and language of Lao-Tse. He had long been looked up to with reverence by numerous disciples; he was sure of his ability to reform the world, if only princes would employ and trust him; and perhaps he could hardly help showing in his manner a certain consciousness of his own merits; but here was an old philosopher who looked him through, and then flouted him and his good deeds and even his way of securing the reign of righteousness on earth. "You think," he was in effect told, "that men can be reformed by the imposition of laws, forms and ceremonies, and by holding up for their imitation the good examples of the ancient worthies. That shows what a superficial knowledge of human nature you have. Why,

the m becom
the li
A ter
but t
over
will altog mout
and n
he wa
at the
and subje
mind
from and c Lao-T
offer.
whole
all pr sacrif
stand
had,
point
positi fly, h
runne
hook
there throu
seen Ther
cour
E Lao-
that refo hom

the way, if all es would be twenty years

 'If Taou,'
 re is no one
 ; if it could ould not wish nounced to announce it o men, there it it to his acquire it?
 ble of giving

we must be that. Law
 f the Spirit hearts which n welcome.
 but neither nfucius and tly indicate l to believe
 l system.
 d language up to with sure of his ould employ elp showing wn merits ;
 m through,
 d even his
 on earth.
 en can be and cere-
 the good ws what a ve. Why,

the more you multiply laws, the more ingenious will men become in evading them. Besides, do not dream that the living will walk for ever in the footprints of the dead. A temporary success may be achieved by your method, but that very success will be little more than a cloak over deceit and corruption, and after a time wickedness will burst out more violently than ever." These were altogether new points of view for Confucius. "My mouth gaped wide," he said, "my tongue protruded, and my soul was plunged in trouble." Could it be that he was on a wrong tack? He had told his disciples that at the age of thirty he "stood firm" in his convictions, and that at forty he "had no doubts" on any of the subjects, to the learning of which he had first bent his mind; yet here was a sage who, looking down upon him from a serene height, scoffed at his merits and ceremonies, and called his learning and wisdom folly. But, after all, Lao-Tse had really nothing in the way of remedy to offer. His ideal, too, meant the abandonment of the whole of that civilisation which represented the toils of all previous generations. Rightly, Confucius would not sacrifice that. Besides, he was utterly unable to understand the process by which the more acute metaphysician had, by intuition rather than by logic, attained to his point of view. He fell back, therefore, upon his own position, saying to his disciples, "I know how birds can fly, how fishes can swim, and how beasts can run. The runner, however, may be snared, the swimmer may be hooked, and the flier may be shot with an arrow. But there is a dragon; I cannot tell how he mounts on the wind through the clouds and rises to Heaven. To-day I have seen Lao-Tse and can only compare him to the dragon." There was a fine candour in this comparison, and more courtesy than Lao-tse had paid Confucius.

Experience, subsequently, might have taught him that Lao-Tse's diagnosis of human nature was correct, and that something more was needed for its permanent reformation than he proposed to supply. On his return home, he gave himself up to his old tasks of studying the wisdom of the ancients, compiling and editing the precious remains of the old national literature, and instructing his disciples. After some time his merits came to be so generally recognised that the Duke appointed him Chief Magistrate of a town, and then Minister of Crime, a position equivalent to that of Prime Minister, with full authority to carry out his ideas in his native country. His success, according to the accounts handed down by admirers, was complete. His theories when applied vindicated themselves. Order reigned throughout the land. He became such a terror to evil-doers that crime disappeared, and such a protection to those who did well that he was the idol of the people and his name flew in songs all over the country. We are told that, under his rule, Loo, his native state, was as England had been in the time of King Alfred. "A thing dropped on the road was not picked up; there was no fraudulent carving of vessels; coffins were made of the ordained thickness; graves were unmarked by mounds raised over them; and no two prices were charged in the markets." In three years he effected a thorough reform in the administration of affairs. Scarcely had the success been accomplished, however, when the little rift appeared that betokened failure. He had assured his disciples that not only would his methods reform sovereign and people, but that neighbouring states would be so attracted by the spectacle that they too would imitate the example set them. The result was precisely the opposite of what he had foretold. The order and prosperity of Loo excited only the jealousy of the neighbouring states, and plots were set on foot to induce the Duke to neglect his great minister. Beautiful girls, well skilled in music and dancing, and the finest horses were sent as presents to his Majesty, and they completely captured him. In comparison with warblings from pretty lips, stories told by a somewhat pedantic old man concerning ancient kings and sages sounded tedious, and precepts drawn from far away times seemed altogether impracticable. Confucius was helpless. According to his

coul
rema
he w
"M
wait sacri ming touc
year
away
to st
his recei advi agai
he w
him,
unde
undc polit
who
of of sider conc said in th
them
"ca
may for l
can acce
best so r foll peri atti ven

editing the literature, and his merits the Duke, and then to that of carry out his, according as complete. Order such a terror such a pro- as the idol all over the e, Loo; his the time of road was not of vessels; graves were o two prices s he effected of affairs. l, however, ailure. He his methods uring states y too would as precisely e order and usy of the t to induce utiful girls, nest horses completely lings from edantic old ed tedious, altogether cording to his system, if the king failed to do his duty the people could not be expected to do theirs; and if the minister remained at his post, when public affairs were neglected, he was to blame, for he had assumed full responsibility. "Master," said Tse-Loo, "it is time you went." After waiting to see if the impressive ceremonial of the solstitial sacrifices would not bring the Duke back to his right mind, and finding that even that had no longer power to touch his conscience, Confucius, now in his fifty-sixth year, reluctantly resigned his high post and turned away—to wander for the next thirteen years from state to state, an exile from his native country. He offered his services to different courts, but though generally received with distinction and even offered pensions for advice which might or might not be taken, he was never again entrusted with power. Either the prince felt that he would be too exacting, or courtiers intrigued against him, or the old ministers pointed out that he did not understand the necessities of the age, and that, though undoubtedly a very wise man, he was not a practical politician. This soon became apparent to his disciples, who, being more concerned than their master at his loss of office, and not taking his exalted view of what he considered to be a heaven-sent mission, urged him to make concessions in harmony with the times. "Your principles," said Tse-Kung, "are excellent, but they are unacceptable in the Empire; would it not be well, therefore, to bate them a little?"—"A good husbandman," replied the sage, "can sow, but he cannot secure a harvest. An artisan may excel in handicraft, but he cannot provide a market for his goods. And in the same way, a superior man can cultivate his principles, but he cannot make them acceptable." This uncompromising answer drew the best natures to him, and never was he surrounded with so many ardent disciples as in those later days, when following him often meant abject poverty and sometimes peril to life. He failed, indeed, to maintain his lofty attitude on every occasion. More than once disciples ventured to point out to him that his conduct seemed inconsistent with his previous teaching. The sunshine of a court partially closed his eyes to the sins of a prince. Danger induced him to give an oath which he had no intention of keeping, and which he deliberately broke, on the plea that "the spirits did not hear oaths, extracted by force." Still, during the long years of his exile, his life was a very noble one. The times were out of joint, and, not being allowed to set them right, he could do little but protest and go on teaching disciples, who might be able to effect more in a happier time. On one occasion, in the course of his wanderings, he fell in with two men, who, evidently in conformity with the teaching of Lao-Tse, had retired from the world. Tse-Loo being sent to ask for information, one of the men answered by asking, "Who are you, sir?" Upon his answering that he was a disciple of Confucius, the recluse replied, "Disorder, like a swelling flood, spreads over the whole Empire, and who is he who will change it for you? Rather than follow one who merely withdraws from this court to that court, had you not better follow those who (like ourselves) withdraw from the world altogether?" These words Tse-Loo, as was his wont, repeated to Confucius, who thus justified his career: "It is impossible to associate with birds and beasts as if they were the same as ourselves. If I associate not with people, with mankind, with whom shall I associate? If right principles prevailed throughout the Empire, there would be no necessity for me to change its state."

The answer of Confucius was complete. It shows us that if he had less insight than Lao-Tse, he had more common sense and a truer philosophy. Pessimism indicates an unhealthy condition, and despair is a sin that can scarcely be forgiven. To retire from the world is to despair of the triumph of reason, and is really inconsistent with faith in Taou, or, with faith in man, who must be the highest expression of Taou. Better far to struggle for the triumph of right principles against all odds, than to fly from the struggle and associate with birds and beasts in preference to associating with one's own

are a
from Flig
relig
we s sym
A
desir resis retu
liter
tion
and have Chir
Fili
of th yout
cour
class Con
him self
best
felt it li prel
wh
spri
the staf

The
"I
sha

own kind. We can practise the fair humanities, which are always within our reach, though we have no message from the Unseen suited to the sins and sorrows of men. Flight, even when apparently sanctified by philosophy or religion, is a victory for selfishness. Only in society do we struggle out of self into truest self-realisation, through sympathy with the life of our brothers.

As Confucius drew nigh to his seventieth year, the desire to see once more his native province became irresistible, and he resolved to end his wanderings and to return and devote the remainder of his life to those literary labours which had always been his chief occupation. He worked till the last, notwithstanding old age and declining strength, and completed the classics which have ever since been esteemed the sacred books of China. The Analects of Confucius and the Treatise on Filial Duties were compiled by his disciples from notes of the master's conversations. There is not a Chinese youth who aspires to a share in the government of the country who has not thoroughly mastered all those classics, together with the Analects of Mencius. When Confucius had finished his great task, he had erected for himself a monument more lasting than brass, and he himself felt that his work was done. As his son and the best beloved of his disciples died, one after another, he felt that his own death must be nigh at hand. He met it like a Stoic, uttering no prayer and betraying no apprehension, weeping bitterly only for the death of those whom he had loved long and well. One morning in the spring of the year 478 B.C. he went out to the front of the door, and, with hands behind his back, dragging his staff, he moved about, crooning,

"The great mountain must crumble ; The strong beam must break ;
And the wise man withers away like a plant."

The words came with a shock to the faithful Tse-Kung. "If the great mountain crumble," said he, "to what shall I look up? If the strong beam break and the wise man wither away, on whom shall I lean? The master I fear is going to be ill." So saying he followed Confucius, into the house. The master told him a dream that he had had the night before, which indicated that his thoughts were dwelling on the ceremonies of the past, to which he had always attached so much importance, and then added mournfully, "No intelligent monarch arises; there is not one in the Empire who will make me his master. My time is come to die." That same day he took to his bed, and after seven days breathed his last. Judged by appearances, his life was a failure, but the failures of some men are infinitely more fruitful than the successes of others.

Confucius did more for his country than any other among the countless myriads of her sons has done. He "aimed at a million." What matter if he missed an unit!

"That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred's soon hit:
This high man, aiming at a million, Misses an unit."

Perhaps the disciples of Confucius who followed him to his grave would not have admitted failure in their master, even to the missing of an unit. Tse-Kung, who built a hut near his grave and remained in it for six years, mourning as for a father, said, "I have all my life had the heaven above my head, but I do not know its height; and the earth under my feet, but I do not know its thickness. In serving Confucius, I am like a thirsty man, who goes with his pitcher to the river and there drinks his fill, without knowing the river's depth." This great man we too must reverence. Certainly, it will not do for any one who wishes to gain Chinamen to dishonour Confucius or to criticise him unfairly.

CHAPTER IV

SOURCES OF THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF CONFUCIANISM

Sources of its strength—Its historic character—Moral code—Characteristic words of Confucianism and Taonism—Why Taouism has failed—The ideal of Confucius—How to secure it—Educational system—Appointment to all public offices by competition—Success of Confucianism—National confession of its inadequacy—Introduction of a foreign religion into China—Definition of Buddhism—Its success—Failure of Confucianism to provide for the permanent elements of religion—Its radical deficiency seen both in the defects and excesses of its characteristic virtue—How shall we commend Christianity to the Chinese.

THE sources of the strength of Confucianism are its historic character, its suitability to Chinese ideals, the excellence of its moral code, and its full recognition of the power of law, of example, of ceremonial and of custom.

Confucius was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of ancient China, which regarded social order as the one thing needful. The Emperor as the head of the government is the basis of society. He is "the Son of Heaven," and is to the people what the father is to the family, the spring and soul of their order and strength. "How he may be so he is to inquire very diligently, and the functions of government are to be chosen according to their fitness to preserve that order, according to their knowledge of the maxims upon which it rests" (Maurice). It is no wonder that a man, penetrated with these deeply-rooted national convictions, should have become alarmed at the social chaos of his time and have meditated how a reformation could be effected. When he believed that he had discovered the way, the thought grew upon him that he had a mission from Heaven, and that by listening to him the state could be saved. What he had to teach was old truth, but he put it in new forms, and his own reflections often coloured and even changed ancient prescriptions and history. He was at one with Lao-Tse in teaching that it was the duty of every man to attain to perfect self-government, not—as Lao-Tse taught—that he might live a solitary, meditative, self-sufficing, primitive life, but that he might be the better able to contribute to the well-being and order of the state. He found the bonds and cement of this order in the actual relationships of life. Fatherly authority was the ultimate principle. Let there be obedience to that and to the other relations to which it leads, and all will be well. He taught, as clearly as Bishop Butler in his celebrated sermons, that our nature is a system, with reason and conscience supreme, and that to rebel against its laws is to rebel against Heaven. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of his moral code is the distinct enunciation of “the Golden Rule.” Professor Legge tells us that Confucius understood it in its positive and most comprehensive sense as well as in the negative form in which it is usually quoted in the classics. “The peculiar nature of the Chinese language enabled him to express the Rule by one character, which for want of a better term we may translate in English by ‘reciprocity.’ The ideogram is composed of two other characters, one denoting ‘heart’ and the other—itsself composite—denoting ‘as’; that is, my heart as or in sympathy with yours.”

Reciprocity is the characteristic word of the system of Confucius; a word, too, much more easily explained than Taou, which is the key to the teaching of Lao-Tse. What, we may ask here, is Taou? It means the way or path, and just as, in the Old Testament, the equivalent word c or the

and, in disciple Chinese
word w
With h
which unless derived describ
was th
Nature
all bei
and to him w suprem virtue of ret
is fou
and th
simpl
any of
to th
and I

So
virtue
prece
that could
the t bein puzz repli
retu
retu
orig
infl

word came to mean the way of Jehovah, or His law, or the way of the righteous or the way of the wicked, and, in the New Testament, "the way" which the disciples of Jesus preached after the resurrection, so, in Chinese use, Taou has these different meanings. The word was constantly in the mouth of Confucius himself. With him it meant the way or method of righteousness which he taught. To Lao-Tse this way was nothing unless it expressed something deeper, from which it derived beauty and power. He therefore used Taou to describe the Absolute, which is beyond description. It was the Eternal order or Being which the laws of Nature and the reason of man mirrored. Along it all beings and things walk. All things originate from it and to it they return. Taou is also a living way for him who conforms to it, and, therefore, should be the supreme object of our desire. "Cultivate Taou and virtue," said Lao-Tse, "and reconcile yourself to a life of retirement and oblivion." He meant that salvation is found only in living according to nature and virtue, and that to obtain salvation we must return to primitive simplicity and so imitate the ancients, who lived without any of this complex civilisation which seems splendid only to the vulgar. This was the ideal of Greek stoicism, and Lao-Tse may be called the Chinese Zeno.

So profound was Lao-Tse's insight into the beauty of virtue that he taught the greatest of the New Testament precepts, "Recompense evil with good." The fact that he enunciated this maxim and that Confucius could not accept it, measures the difference between the two men. One of Confucius' school heard it, and, being puzzled, consulted the master. He also was puzzled, formed a syllogism in his mind about it, and replied, "Return good for evil! What then will you return for good? Recompense injury with justice, and return good for good."

How was it that so great a man as Lao-Tse, the most original thinker that China has produced, failed to influence China? For the same reason that stoicism succeeded only with elect souls like Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. Give up the vain shows of the world and follow virtue, and you will find that virtue is its own reward, cried both Zeno and Lao-Tse. But it is useless to ask men to give up what they believe to be real for something that to them is unreal. Christianity has succeeded with high and low, rich and poor, because it reveals, in God the Father united to us by the spirit of Jesus, the great reality; and the master passion of love for the Saviour casts out from our hearts all meaner passions.

To Confucius, society was the great reality. Civilization, with its material splendour, social order and settled government, was an unspeakable blessing. For its preservation he trusted mainly to the combined influences of education, example and rigid ceremonial; and to him it is chiefly owing that the educational system of China is so wonderfully complete. We must also remember that, according to him, the chief object of education is moral, and that this object was always kept in view. It consisted not in mere mastery of what we would call the three R's or of anything technical, nor in ability to acquire wealth, but in instruction in ethical and social science, and the formation of moral character. One of the old kings had said: "The great God has conferred on the people a moral sense, compliance with which would show their natures invariably right. To cause them tranquilly to pursue the course which it indicates is the task of the sovereign." Confucius adopted this as the pivot of his educational system. He insisted that it only needed virtue in the rulers and instruction from them to secure virtue in the subjects. Education, therefore, lies at the very foundation of government, and, as a matter of fact, education has permeated Chinese society from top to bottom for centuries, while—whether for good or evil—China is still far in advance of all other countries in its system of competitive examination.

The whole public service is thrown open to competition.

China,
admini
persons of birth proved success
ingly,
who ca
their while gether
to obe
speak
to lov
good.
examp
maxim more
they
"Hu
sente
have an et ficial hono
differ
have assign
comp
elega
T
exam
but neig
his f
and cons
allo

tion. There is only one recognised portal of office in China, and that is the examination hall. Consequently, the administration is not in the hands of demagogues, nor of persons selected more or less according to the accident of birth or haphazard methods, but of men who have proved their fitness by submitting to the severe tests of successive examinations. In no other country, accordingly, is education so highly valued. All the gentry who can afford the expense employ, for the education of their children, private tutors well versed in the classics, while the boys of the poorer classes are gathered together for instruction in public schools. All are taught to obey their parents, to be respectful to their elders, to speak the truth, to conduct themselves with propriety, to love their fellow-men and to associate with the good. The inculcation of duty is backed up by examples from the lives of ancient worthies, sententious maxims, and long quotations from text-books. The more of these that the students can quote the better, and they do quote with astonishing freedom and accuracy. "Hundreds of thousands of the literati can repeat every sentence in the classical books; the masses of the people have scores of the Confucian maxims, and little else of an ethical nature, in their memories—and with a beneficial result." It is not enough for candidates for literary honours to master the texts. They must study the different readings and the different interpretations that have been given to different passages, with the reasons assigned for each. They must also acquire the art of composition, and a style that combines clearness, vigour, elegance and purity.

The pupil's first step is to pass the preliminary examination; and he is not only examined on his studies, but the local magistrate institutes inquiries among his neighbours concerning his moral character, and whether his forefathers have for three generations been respectable and not employed in certain specified occupations that are considered degrading. Having stood these tests he is allowed, after three years' study, to go to the examination that is held in every one of the prefectures into which each of the twenty provinces of China is divided ; and on passing it and presenting satisfactory testimonials of good moral character from scholars of advanced standing, he receives his first degree, and becomes what we would call a Bachelor of Arts. Great are the rejoicings in his family and his native place when this step is taken successfully. The next examination, which leads to the Master's degree, is very strict, only seventy or eighty degrees being conferred, though there are usually thousands of candidates. In the following spring an examination is held at Peking under the auspices of the Board of Rites for the degree of Doctor, open to all Masters of Arts from any part of the Empire. Only a certain limited number from each province can be successful in this examination. Afterwards, there is a final competition among the successful Doctors, held within the walls of the palace, the Emperor appearing in person as the examiner. At all these examinations elaborate provisions are made to secure impartiality as well as ability on the part of examiners, and should any be found guilty of corruption or unfairness, or neglect of proper precautions, the punishments are very severe. In 1858 the chief examiner having been proved guilty of favouring a candidate who was a nephew of his own by marriage, was publicly beheaded on the common executioner's ground at Peking, although the Emperor wished to spare him on account of previous meritorious public service. Examiners may set questions on any subject which is referred to in the classics or the great commentaries;—on History or Geography, meaning, of course, the History and Geography of China ; on Law, Medicine, Astronomy, Mathematics or Natural Science—in which as yet the Chinese are by no means strong ; above all, on Moral Philosophy and Social and Political Science. When the Doctor's degree has been obtained, the prize is felt by the candidate to be well worth his many years of study and anxiety. Every place of honour in the Empire up to that of Prime Minister is open to him. After an apprenticeship in the conduct of public business under China

struct Indee
that c tions
ment Servic
more
coloni
Co succes
worsh sions are un structi
to ma
Whet
ficius
have than specul
their presen
It has
was t been Chine
and r unive know How
them
Not t
them
and t
us m traine
that

under official superiors, an office is given him. The Chinese consider it the glory of the nation that public instruction and public business should thus go hand in hand. Indeed, we may say that an educational system like that of China is the ideal after which many administrations in Christendom are groping. The British Government has adopted the principle, as regards the Civil Service of the Indian Empire, and it is being applied more and more to many departments at home and in the colonies.

Confucianism has had undoubtedly a measure of success. It confines itself to this world, formal organised worship being restricted to the Emperor, and the occasions for it being few. It is opposed to idolatry. Priests are unknown to it, and so are ministers of religion. Instruction in the classics supplies all that is thought needed to make men wise, wealthy, honoured and virtuous. Whether we call it a religion or not, this is what Confucius meant by religion, and his "way" could not have been tried among a people better suited for it than the Chinese, a people eminently practical and un-speculative, the traders of the East, and who, so far as their Confucianism is concerned, are "what people of the present day are wishing to become in Europe" (Huc). It has been tried, too, on as vast a scale as pure Deism was tried, in the case of Mohammedanism. What has been the result? This, on the very surface, that the Chinese people, after adopting the system enthusiastically and raising temples to Confucius himself, have all but universally acknowledged its insufficiency. This acknowledgment was not made openly by the literati. How could they be dissatisfied with a system which gave them everything and made them the real kings of China? Not that it has made them great men. They have proved themselves barren in speculation, poetry, science and art, and they know nothing of the "mighty hopes that make us men." One reason for this may be that they are trained entirely with a view to the public service, but that cannot be the whole reason. They are, according to the testimony of competent observers, conceited, immoral, unprogressive, intolerant; in a word, all that educated men should not be. Of course, there are brilliant exceptions, but according to European experience this is the character of the class. But even they have unconsciously acknowledged the inadequacy of Confucianism as a religion. Buddhism and Taouism, though called heterodox, came in time to have an acknowledged position in the State; and not only the masses, but the literati, openly or secretly, seek through these religions that intercourse with the spiritual world which Confucianism denies them.

This is a wonderful confession, made by a whole people. It shows that Confucius, by restricting divine worship to the Emperor, refusing to acknowledge man's personal relation to God and confessing total ignorance of the future, left an awful void wholly unsupplied. Taouism offered to fill this up. It spoke at first of something divine and mysterious in each person, that was above earth, above man, and even above the state; but when Lao-Tse passed away, the popular superstitions, that had been growing up among the masses for two thousand years, attached themselves to his name, and Taouism then degenerated into a compound of charms, incantations, magical arts and elixirs, to propitiate supernatural beings, and into a gross idolatry that often amounts to Shamanism or demon worship. An Emperor arose who was a blind and bigoted believer in these superstitions, and for some time Taouism had the field very much to itself. Confucianism was ridiculed and suppressed; distinguished teachers of the system were buried alive, and the classical books searched for in order to be burned, as rigorously as the sacred Scriptures were searched for in the persecution of Diocletian for the same purpose. Taouism was thereby discredited, but with the revival of Confucianism the old void was felt as before. Another Emperor, hearing of a great prophet that had arisen in India, whose light had extended to Thibet, determined to send thither for

miss
new
They
the Chin
could this Emp
the u inwa syste rulec

T
tion
tised liturg supp
the u
ever
or r thou
thing cult
in C
same five by o
on Con
Tao
foun
and adm
A. D.
state
and
from prim
with

missionaries or books, that he might be instructed in the new faith. His councillors tried hard to dissuade him. They pointed out how grievously he was departing from the longest cherished and most universally accepted Chinese maxims by thus admitting that anything good could come from abroad, but he was determined, and in this way the Buddhist faith was imported into the Empire. "A religion resting upon communion with the unseen world, in all its outward and in many of its inward characteristics the direct opposite of the Confucian system, gained footing on the soil on which that system ruled" (Maurice).

Taouism, which had previously been a mere accumulation of popular superstitions, formed itself into a systematised religion on the model of Buddhism, with temples, liturgies, idols and forms of popular worship. Both supplied elements acknowledging the relation of man to the unseen world, and the masses of the people have ever since been divided between these two religions, or rather they adopt features from both indifferently, though no educated man will admit that he is anything but a Confucianist. It is this that makes it difficult to take a census of the "three great denominations" in China. All three religions may be professed by the same person. This is why Buddhism is credited with five hundred millions of adherents by some authorities and by others with only one hundred millions. It all depends on whether we count the Chinese as Buddhists or Confucianists. Buddhism found the soil prepared by Taouism. Moreover, it offered in the person of its founder a far more attractive personality than Lao-Tse, and consequently—in spite of the national reluctance to admit that there can be such a thing as foreign culture,—in A.D. 65, it was officially acknowledged as a religion of the state. Since that time, by conforming to Chinese ideas and modes of life, and so becoming a very different thing from the Buddhism of Thibet and still more from primitive Buddhism, it has covered the whole Empire with its temples, and pushed its conquests to the far north by means of zealous missionaries, whose influence for good over Tartars and Mongols was a marvellous tribute to the supremacy of moral forces over untamed and bloodthirsty savages.

Here, then, we have on the very surface of Chinese society a national confession of the failure of Confucianism. The people who gave it birth and who extol its excellency have been obliged to supplement it with a foreign religion. The result is a division of man into two or even three parts, that has been disastrous to life. When one professes Confucianism and worships in a Buddhist temple, his real life is apt to be divorced from religion and his religion divorced from reason.

As a political and educational system Confucianism has been so far successful. It has made China the most uniform, the most closely compacted, and the most conservative nation in the world. But whether the success is worth much may be questioned. Wisdom being viewed solely from an external and experimental point of view, the people have become singularly patient and industrious, it is true, but also prosaic, materialistic and conceited. Lao-Tse saw the danger, but his teaching, which viewed wisdom as something internal and mystical, has degenerated into an idolatry of every object in nature and—so far as its priests are concerned—into mere quackery. Buddhism entered on the field that Confucianism had ignored and Taouism failed to fill. It is difficult to define Buddhism in two or three sentences. It has been represented as Atheism, as Theism, and as Pantheism; as the actual worship of saints and as pure symbolism; as vulgar idolatry and the highest abstract speculation. There must be a point of view that includes and harmonises these different representations, but at present it is enough to say that Buddhism is based on a belief (1) in the infinite capacity of the human intellect, intelligence in man being identical with the absolute intelligence; and (2) in the power of self-culture to effect, under the training of Gautama's Law and Society, a change of heart, which secures not only the individual's

own
call mul mer
and doo very cern igno

The
on only
but dest dom thin
ren.
of H
bein
and unfil
the real matt
mul
unio
the Wit
tena
ther imp
less
repu

“
But
imp
sens

own salvation but something much nobler—a state of being called Bodhisatship, which confers blessing on countless multitudes in the long ages of the future. The development of this second doctrine connected man's interests and hopes with supernatural agencies and opened the door to a flood of superstitious fancies; but, just on this very account, it offered answers to those questions concerning the unseen that men ask and that Confucianism ignores.

The fact of the failure of Confucianism is patent. The causes of its failure are that Confucius based religion on man and ignored God. Consequently, he had not only an inadequate conception of man's real dignity but also a poor ideal for man, while his religion was destitute of spiritual dynamic. Israel and Christendom were taught to look up to the Eternal and to think of Him as not far from any one of His children. Nature is His garment; history the revelation of His will; and in Him we live, move, and have our being. To know and to love God is therefore the first and great commandment, and experience proves that until men know God and are in right relation to Him, the relations between themselves will not be felt to have real sanctity and will not be faithfully maintained, no matter how we surround them with ceremonial and multiply laws enjoining their observance. In personal union with God is our true dignity and the pledge that the individual and society shall go on to perfection. Without this factor in thought and life, there may be tenacious conservatism of all the good gained in the past; there may be a glacier-like immobility, which—however imposing it may appear to Chinamen and however resistless the momentum when it is once set in motion—is so repugnant to us that we have no hesitation in saying,

“Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay”;

but there cannot be that sense of human nothingness, of imperfection and of dependence, from which arises the sense of sin and which is, at the same time, the true measure of our greatness ; there cannot be that fellowship with God which is the spring of life and joy, which enables us to resist temptation and to be more than conquerors over all enemies ; there cannot be that spirit of progress which fills us with the hope of attaining unto greater things than any that the past knew, greater things even than those which Jesus Himself did upon earth, seeing that He is now no longer conditioned by the limitations of humanity, but—as our Head and Priest—has ascended to the right hand of the Father, where angels, principalities and powers are subject unto Him.

Confucianism, then, does not make full provision for any one of the permanent elements of religion—(a) dependence, (b) fellowship, (c) progress. Tested by this standard it is even more defective than Mohammedanism.

(a) There can be no sense of dependence where the worship of God is restricted to the offering of sacrifices on state occasions by the Emperor. This thrusting of God into the background or to an inaccessible height, and the prominence given to the doctrine of the goodness of human nature and its sufficiency to make us perfect, explain why there is so little sense of sin, especially among the literati, and why Christ crucified is such a stone of stumbling to the educated that converts to Christianity in China are almost entirely from the lower classes. It is more difficult for an orthodox high dignitary to become a Christian than for “a camel to go through the eye of a needle.” His inadequate conception of holiness and sin, his low ideal of life, and his pharisaic consciousness of merit surround him with a triple coat of brass. According to Dr. Legge, Confucianism—though professedly indifferent to all religions—tends to make the heart more impervious to the gospel than even Taoism does, although the latter openly avows its hatred, because it regards Christianity as a rival. “There is,” he says, “no bringing down of God to men in Confucianism in order to lift them up to Him. Their moral shortcomings, when brought home to t conv

is a
conf
and are than
gosp dign
mor
stud
conv
and of fi Chr
hill
he
He
Of
miss
for t
(
afar
men eith
ship sho hop fait mis
Wh
not
the

2
writ
sup bein
tran
of t

to them, may produce a feeling of shame, but hardly a conviction of guilt. Taoism, as a system of superstitions, is antagonistic to Christianity; but where its professors confine themselves to the study of the Taou-Teh King,¹ and cultivate the humility and abnegation of self which are there so strongly inculcated, they are more prepared than the Confucian literati to receive the message of the gospel. So I found it in the case of one Taoist dignitary who visited me in Hong-Kong, when he was more than fourscore years old. He told me that his study of the Taou of Lao-Tse for fifty years had convinced him of his impotency to attain to its ideal, and he had almost resigned himself to despair, hopeless of finding some truth for which his heart yearned. Some Christian tracts were brought to the monastery, on the hill of Lo-fau, over which he presided. 'I read them,' he said, 'and it was as if scales fell from my eyes.' He accepted at once the revelation of God in Christ. Of all the Chinese whom I met with in my long missionary experience he was the one most 'prepared for the Lord.'²

(b) There can be no fellowship with a God who is afar off. Human life then ceases to be divine. But, men will worship. In the hour of temptation they must either find strength not their own, or make irretrievable shipwreck. In the day of distress they will cry, even should it be to the unknown God. When well-founded hopes are disappointed, cherished plans frustrated, and faith is mocked or betrayed, it will only add to their misery to think that the Maker of all things is a mocker. When death snatches away their best beloved, they will not believe that all is over for ever. In such circumstances the heart will not be satisfied with stale maxims. Any religion will be better than none. Having no God, men will betake themselves to ghosts.

¹ The Taou-Teh-King (lit. Taou and Virtue-book), the only writing that Lao-Tse left behind him, gives no warrant for the superstitions and idolatries of modern Taoism. Though very brief, being only about twice as long as the Sermon on the Mount, a good translation in English is much longer, owing to the condensed style of the original.

² Religions of China, pp. 294, 295.

(c) So, too, there can be no spirit of hope and no progress to illimitable horizons for a people who find wisdom only in the past. "The past is made for slaves," says Emerson. We understand what he means when we think of Confucianism. The result of dwelling in the past has been that the God who inspired the ancient sages has receded into invisibility and only the sages are now seen; while, the farther we are borne away from them down the stream of time, the more dimly shines their cold starlight. Progress is possible only to people who believe that the God that inspired holy men of old inspires men still, who believe that He is a living God and the God of the living, and who always hear his voice saying, "Speak unto the people that they go forward."

When a religion is defective at the root, the evil can be seen in every branch. Thus it is that the habit of dwelling in the past influences even the view taken of filial piety, the very virtue in the practice of which China may be said to set a conspicuous example to Christendom. The character that represents filial piety is that of "an old man seated on or supported by his son." The opposite idea, which to us is equally true, that the father should make all the provision he can for his son, is excluded. Dr. Legge says that he never quoted Paul's words to the Corinthian Church, "the children ought not to lay up for the parents but the parents for the children," without encountering a storm of opposition. And, "when I tried to show that the sentiment was favourable to the progress of society and would enable each generation to start from a higher standpoint, I found it difficult to obtain a hearing."

Not only is this characteristic Chinese virtue made one-sided and thereby injured by defect, but it is also injured by excess. It is carried to lengths which blind men to the difference between right and wrong, truth and falsehood. Thus, Confucius would have a father

conce
father
And,
to be
that was s
great
play

H China
than
and t
time, prese
motiv
every up un

Id
begin
and t
but t huma
ignor
have three Chin
succ
Latin
resul
ledg
man
he h a ba by t
of t
for t reta it m
1 Co

conceal the dishonesty of a son, and a son that of his father. "Uprightness is to be found in this," he said. And,¹ "every boy has held up to him, as an example to be followed, the conduct of Laou Lai-Tse, who, fearing that the recognition by his parents of the fact that he was seventy years old would remind them of their own great age, used to dress himself in a child's dress and play about the room like an infant!"

How shall we commend Christianity to the Chinese? China will not be satisfied with a religion less historical than that of Confucius or less suited to her traditions and to her social and political ideals, but, at the same time, she needs a religion that reveals the Eternal, presents higher ideals of life and inspires permanent motives to virtue and holiness. Religion must be, in every soul and in the nation, "a well of water springing up unto everlasting life."

Ideas now flow from people to people. Men are beginning to be conscious of their common humanity and to feel that truth is one. Other races may die out, but the Chinese will be one of the permanent factors of humanity. Their fibre is of the toughest. Confucius ignored their spiritual needs. Lao-Tse and Gautama have tried and failed to satisfy them. But all these three great men may be made schoolmasters to lead China to Christ, even as Zeno, Plato, Cicero, and their successors, were the schoolmasters that led the Greek and Latin-speaking world to Him in the centuries after the resurrection. The old schoolmasters must be acknowledged. All due honour must be paid to them. No man is fitted to present the gospel to the Chinese till he has become a Chinaman, as Paul became a Greek, a barbarian, or a Jew. Injustice done to their nation by the nations of Christendom, high-handed treatment of their kindred when they come to our shores, contempt for their ancient customs,—these things will only provoke retaliation, which will be all the more severe the longer it may be delayed. We must operate along the lines of least resistance. Matteo Ricci, Schaal, Legge, Martin, Mackay, and other wise men have shown the way. It is thus pointed out by one of themselves, the Hon. Pung-Kwang-Yu, in his address at Chicago: "Let missionaries impress upon the male portion of their converts the importance of teaching the female portion at home, in order not to have women and girls frequent churches. The only God is omnipresent according to the teaching of Christianity. Christ himself prayed only for others in public worship, while he taught his disciples to pray in secret, and never recommended that men and women should go to the house of worship together. There is no objection, however, to men teaching men and women teaching women in separate houses of worship. In the next place, Christian converts in China should be made to understand that they should look after and support their aged and infirm parents, and should be permitted neither to live apart from their parents nor to destroy the halls for the worship of their ancestors. Perhaps the customs of the Chinese people are different from the customs of the western nations in this respect, but there is nothing in this practice that seems to run counter to the commandment given by Moses and Christ, 'Thou shalt honour thy father and thy mother.' These two things are the most important for missionaries to bear in mind if they have the welfare of the missionary cause in China at heart and desire to secure for themselves the enjoyment of peace and freedom from molestation."

¹ Confucianism and Taoism, by R. K. Douglas, pp. 120, 145-146

After Paul and his fellow-labourers had been two years in Ephesus, the town-clerk testified that "these men were neither robbers of temples nor blasphemers of our Goddess." One result of doing missionary work in this way was that "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord." Paul knew well that when Jesus entered the heart, there would be no place for Diana. He who runs may read the lesson of this example, even should he unwisely consider it his duty to disregard the counsels of a Chinese official.

Religio

w

H

st

V

E

so

cr

T

is

fo

se

Su

H

IND

in

contin

bound

and la

million

ans, an

that h

munit

invade

to the

goes o

sire to united

CHAPTER V

HINDUISM

Religions in India—Causes why Mohammedanism continues to make proselytes—Origin of the people of India—Hinduism not identified with one name—Necessity to study its various religious books and its history—The Vedic literature—The Rig-Veda—Development into Brahmanism—Its theological, priestly, and philosophical sides—Its advance upon Vedism—Its general creed—Sacred law books—Contest with Buddhism—The Epics—Doctrine of incarnations—Modern Hinduism—Sacred books inculcating salvation by faith—The form, tone, and contents of the Puranas—Popular Hindu sects—Vaishnavism and Saivism—Demonolatry—Summary of what we find and what we do not find in Hinduism.

INDIA is a country superior to China in interest and inferior only in population. It, too, may be called a continent, for it is continental as regards great natural boundaries, size, population, and varieties of race, religion, and language. Its population includes nearly two hundred millions of Hindus, more than fifty millions of Mohammedans, and about twenty or thirty millions of aboriginal tribes that have not yet been absorbed into the general community. When Arab, Afghan or Persian Mohammedan invaders ruled India, many of the people became converts to the religion of the court. Successful proselytism still goes on. The main causes are said to be two: (1) The desire to be freed from the bondage of caste and to become united to a common brotherhood. The early success of Buddhism in India shows how strong an appeal this sentiment makes to the Hindu mind, though the fact of Brahmanism being able to maintain the institution of caste shows that there is an opposite sentiment equally influential. (2) The conviction that the Universe is one, which is at the basis of Hinduism, inspires a desire to escape from the bewildering multiplicity of the popular deities to the simple monotheism of Mohammedanism, with its easily learned cry, "There is no god but God, and Mohammed is the prophet of God." Both causes augur well for the eventual triumph of Christianity.

India is now part of the British Empire, and its higher castes are of the same Aryan or Indo-European race as ourselves. Four or five thousand years ago, common ancestors are supposed to have inhabited the great central plateau of Asia, living there a pastoral life. As population increased, some bands migrated south-eastwards through the mountain passes into the Punjab, and gradually overran India. Before their arrival the land was occupied by aboriginal races and invading tribes of Dravidian origin, who, from intermarrying with the aborigines or from long exposure to the Indian sun, had become so dark in colour that the invaders called them "black-skins," in contrast with their own fair complexion. Allusions abound in the early literature to conflicts between these older inhabitants and the Aryan immigrants. Gradually, the former were thrust back from the fertile plains or absorbed as serfs by the latter. The conquerors gave birth to the Sanskrit language and to the religion known successively as Vedism, Brahmanism, and Hinduism. Another section of the same Aryan race streamed south-westwards into Persia, gave birth to the Zend language, wrote the Zendavesta, the inspiring mind of Zoroaster probably contributing its principal germs, and established the Persian Empire, which under different forms lasted as a world-power till overthrown by the Mohammedan Arabs. Other bands streamed due west into Europe. Of these, some established the Greek and Roman, and others the Keltic, Teutonic, and Slavonic civilisations.

The fa
inhabiti
the cra who fo

Sure
the gre
a peopl intellec
varta, t
call it.

Unlike

we may religion

has be varied s

psalmis

preache

many-s

to Sir

human

instinct

every f

no org

has an

who ba

ual sup

It has

elastic

varieti

no on

like of

toward

of sacr

relatio

may b

lishme

theisti

1 M

part ii-

The family has spread widely; and now one branch, inhabiting a little island thousands of miles distant from the cradle, rules over the teeming millions of its kindred who found a home in India!

Surely, we ought to know something of the religion of the great majority of our own fellow-subjects. They are a people of profound spiritual instincts and of the keenest intellect, and there is no fairer land on earth than Aryavarta, the abode of the Aryans, as they still delight to call it. But it is not easy to obtain this knowledge. Unlike Mohammedanism, Confucianism, Taouism, or—we may add—Mazdeism, Buddhism or Christianity, their religion is not identified with one name. No one man has been able to embrace and represent in himself its varied spiritual forces. It counts inspired sages, prophets, psalmists, law-givers, priests, philosophers, reformers, preachers, ascetics, and revivalists by the thousand. So many-sided is it and so luxuriant its life that, according to Sir Monier Williams, "It is the natural religion of humanity or the collective outcome of man's devotional instincts, unguided by direct revelation. It admits of every form of internal growth and development. It has no organised hierarchy under one supreme head, but it has an infinite number of separate associations of priests, who band themselves together for the extension of spiritual supremacy over ever-increasing masses of population. It has no one formal Confession of Faith, but it has an elastic pantheistic creed, capable of adaptation to all varieties of opinion and practice. It has no one Bible, no one collection of writings in one compact volume, like our Holy Bible, with lines of teaching converging towards one great central truth; but it has a long series of sacred books, some of which profess to be direct revelations from the Supreme Being, and each of which may be used independently as an authority for the establishment of any kind of doctrine, deistic, theistic, polytheistic or pantheistic."¹ Sects of all kinds spring up

¹ Monier Williams, "Progress of Indian Religious Thought," part ii.—Contemporary Review, December 1878.

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic
Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

10 16 18 20 22 25
28 32 36

10 16 18 20 22 25
28 32 36

in every century, differing from each other, radically and fundamentally, in their views of the world, man, and God; and yet all alike are orthodox Hindus. We are thus without the key that proved so useful to us in opening up the innermost chambers of Mohammedanism and Confucianism. There is no one great personality who has absorbed all that there is in the Hindu mind and history, to understand whom is to understand the religion of India. We have therefore to study, instead, sacred books written by many authors, or great periods of history to which names have been given indicating marked stages in the progress of religious thought. For those who are never likely to read the sacred books of India, or to trace the developments that have taken place during three thousand years of constant intellectual activity, it must be enough to explain the fundamental principles of the religion and to give a sketch of the state of society that has resulted from their interaction with other forces.

I. THE VEDIC LITERATURE.—When a Hindu scholar speaks of the Veda he means

(a) The books commonly known by us as the four Vedas;

(b) The Brahmanas, subsequent writings that explain, illustrate and direct the ritualistic use of the old texts or hymns of the Vedas;

(c) The Upanishads, appended to the Brahmanas, and intended to bring out more fully and systematically the references in the earlier writings to the great problems of the universe.

Speaking broadly, these three divisions of the Veda were written respectively by poets, priests and philosophers; written at great intervals of time. All alike are called the Veda, that is, divine knowledge; or S'ruti, that is, what has been directly heard or revealed.

The oldest Vedic literature consists of the 1028 hymns of the Rig-Veda, composed probably between the fifteenth and tenth centuries before Christ.¹ They were the first

¹ With regard to dates, we must remember that scholars can give compo moved high ta

of the
and sp
new an into sn
the Pe
adorati
felt to
and p generat had be ancient all Hir
They s singers sharply
Agni, present is spol physiol
the wo religion
and pa
There
to enfo migrati
conne ate be the sar
to be denote a gift ings re shared

only va without needed

compositions of the tribes who are supposed to have moved down in successive waves of migration from the high tablelands of Central Asia into the Punjab. Some of the leaders of those immigrants were men of poetic and spiritual power. These, coming in contact with the new and beautiful forms of nature in India, burst forth into snatches of song (like those that are imbedded in the Pentateuch, e.g. Numbers xxi. 14-30), or hymns of adoration and praise to elemental forces or supreme powers felt to be beyond all visible things. These songs, hymns, and prayers were handed down from generation to generation, and at length men came to believe that they had been supernaturally revealed, and to this day the ancient sages or rishis who wrote them are revered by all Hindus. They embody no settled system of faith. They simply express the vague conceptions of the best singers of the early Aryan invaders. The gods are not sharply distinguished from each other. In one hymn, Agni, who represents fire, in another Indra, who represents rain, in another Surya, who represents the sun, is spoken of as supreme. Max Müller gives to this physiolatry or nature worship the name of henotheism, or the worship of one god at a time; but it is a phase of religion so fluid that monotheism, tritheism, polytheism, and pantheism, have all been deduced from the Veda. There is no reference to idol-worship, to caste, to suttee, to enforced widowhood, to self-mutilation, to the transmigration of souls, or to any of the abuses that became connected with Hinduism at later stages. The people ate beef, though now a cow-killer and an infidel mean the same thing, and the worship of the cow may be said to be the common bond among Hindus. Sacrifice denoted simply the dedication to a god or the gods of a gift or of food, as an expression of gratitude for blessings received or as an indication that the worshippers shared in a common life with the deity. The head of only vague conjectures from internal evidence, and that these are without the support or check from definite historical facts always needed to make such evidence reliable.

the family was the priest. The gods were the elements and processes of nature, gradually converted into the symbols of religious feeling or objects of religious worship. The phenomena of light arrested them most powerfully, and hence they gave the generic name of Deva or Dyaus, that is, the bright one, to every striking natural force or form. All were called Devas or bright ones, and we meet with the name of Dyaus-Pitar, Bright or Heaven-Father; the Diespiter or Jupiter of the Romans, the Zeus Pater of the Greeks and—we may add—the germ of “our Father in Heaven” revealed to us in Jesus Christ.

From such beginnings, and such a people, it might have been hoped that a pure monotheism and spiritual religion would have developed, much more than from Israel, a tribe whose natural disposition was towards the coarse, bloody and licentious worship of the surrounding tribes to which it was kin. Instead, we have—after endless oscillations and earnest and pathetic yearnings for God—only the sects of modern Hinduism, with Puranas and Tantras for their Bibles, and an idolatry so universal that it is easier to find a god than a man in India!

Gradually, with increasing mental development and increasing complexity of life, the inadequacy of the old Vedism came to be felt. Doubts concerning the bright gods of their fathers, and then unbelief, took the place of simple faith. But scepticism and unbelief are only stages that mark the halting places of the human spirit in its search after God, the pauses of a religious people, while new and wider religious forms are being prepared.

What was the new form that the religion of India assumed? As might be expected, it was one that found its germs in and that fulfilled the old. In the old hymns we note a perpetual seeking or feeling after one supreme being or spirit which was felt to permeate all things. In worshipping the light, the fire, the rain, the clouds and the sun, the rishis were yearning after God. Him they worshipped, though ignorantly, as the Athenians had, in their way, before Paul preached to them Jesus and the

recurr
home
menta
—“T
name,
They
through before
consult super eterna expans creatic
varieti
Ho
imper
Brahm
rather whose will th existen develo born a
of the elabor
the La like B
to sati
the V
the p
the d celebr
person
and fo these gives
and r
comp

resurrection. The order and oneness of nature came home to them more and more, and at length the fundamental note of all subsequent Hindu thought was struck—"There is but one being, no second." They gave a name, too, to this mysterious, all-controlling spirit. They called it Brahmā (Bruhm), or that which expands through all space and grows into everything. Brahmā is before all. All things are by him and all things are consubstantial with him. "It is the self-existing supreme self, the only really existing essence, the one eternal germ of all things, and it delights in infinite expansion, in infinite manifestation of itself, in infinite creation, dissolution and recreation, through infinite varieties and diversities of operation."¹

How did the universe originate from this eternal and impersonal spirit? By emanation and not by creation. Brahmā was, emphatically, serene intelligence, thought rather than will, rest rather than a sovereign, one from whose meditation all worlds flowed out, not one by whose will they had been created. Brahmā by meditation gave existence to the waters and to a productive seed, which developed into a golden egg, and from that egg he was born as Brahmā, the creator of all things. This theory of the mundane egg became the starting-point for an elaborate cosmogony which is given in the first chapter of the Laws of Menu and in the Puranas. A colourless deity like Brahmā, who had acted once as creator, was too remote to satisfy the people; and two other deities, also named in the Vedas, were gradually associated with him,—Vishnu, the preserver, and Siva or Maha-deva (the great god), the destroyer of the universe. Thus originated the celebrated Hindu Triad or Trimurti. Each of its three persons was associated with a consort, to show that male and female are indissolubly united. The conception of these three gods, as creator, preserver and destroyer, gives a very inadequate idea of their complex character and relations. Their unity is typified by the three letters composing the mystic syllable, AUM or Om. They are coequal, and their functions are constantly interchangeable. Symbols of them are the triangle or three majestic heads springing out of one body. Kalidasā, called the Indian Shakespeare, because the greatest poet that India has produced, says—

¹ Sir M. Williams, Hinduism, pp. 86 and 86.

“In those three persons the one god was shown, Each first in place, each last—not one alone; Of Siva, Vishnu, Brahmā, each may be First, second, third, among the blessed Three.”

Along with this theological development from Vedism into Brahmanism came the great social development into castes, which has ever since been the framework of the religion of India. In the Vedic hymns, two classes, the royal or military and the literary or priestly, are recognised as above the level of the “Vis” or bulk of the community. Eventually, and after long struggles between the first two classes, the three came to be distinguished from each other as Brahmans, Kshatriyas, and Vaisyas, and all three still more rigidly from a fourth, the Sudras, who consisted chiefly of the conquered races, and who differed from the others in colour, habits, and language. In spite of stringent regulations to the contrary, intermarriages took place, which produced different shades of complexion and different castes, until now there are hundreds of castes; but, whatever modifications the system has undergone, the fundamental distinction between twice-born men and other men has remained. The youth of the three upper classes, after investiture with a sacred cord, worn over the left shoulder and under the right arm, and initiation into the study of the Veda with solemn sacramental ceremonial, are called the twice-born. The duty of the Sudra is to serve the twice-born classes and, above all, the Brahmans, who took precedence, after a time, even of the royal or military caste. They were the clergy, in the mediæval sense of the word, that is, the only educated class. They alone, therefore, were capable of discharging priestly functions. Having emanated from the mouth of Brahmā, they were in closest relations to him,

a mor theolo invest instin
branc Brah
three princ
of me
a tim in ho where

T
was t
and a sin b nume
felt.
that sacri
ritual
more
regul
were is sur
The
of th
it, w phil
the s phil
to t all t
west sear
man
due meth

antly inter-gle or three Kalidasā, greatest poet

shown,
 alone ;

Three."

from Vedism
 opment into work of the classes, the e recognised
 community.
 the first two l from each and all three ho consisted iffered from

In spite of rriages took mplexion and s of castes ;
 undergone,
 e-born men of the three aced cord,
 ht arm, and olemn sacra-

The duty
 s and, above
 fter a time, y were the
 that is, the vere capable anated from relations to him, and were best able to guide their fellows. They had a monopoly of Vedic learning, and that included not only theology and philosophy, but every subject that required investigation. Reverence for the past and the natural instinct of traditionalism made them trace back every branch of knowledge to the Veda. The position of the Brahmans at length became unchallenged. For twenty-three centuries, they have been the counsellors of Hindu princes and the teachers of the Hindu people. No class of men elsewhere has held so proud a position for so long a time, though they are seen in their old status now, only in holy cities like Benares or in obscure country places where railways and factories have not yet penetrated.

The advance that Brahmanism indicated on Vedism was two-fold,—the assertion of a first cause of the universe and a deepened consciousness of sin. As confessions of sin became more frequent, sacrificial acts became more numerous, and the necessity for propitiatory sacrifices was felt. So great a development took place in this direction that Brahmanic literature has more words relating to sacrifice than the Jewish or any other literature. The ritual became more burdensome and the divisions of caste more rigid. To organise society accordingly and to regulate life, priestly directories were required. These were the Brahmanas. But, when ritual is overdone, there is sure to be a recoil, probably in more than one direction. The Upanishads, containing speculations on the doctrine of the universally diffused essence and man's relation to it, were the first expression of this. Men sought in philosophy for relief from ritual. The Upanishads are the source of the Darsānas or the systems of orthodox philosophy, which give the answers of Hindu philosophers to the fundamental questions of thought and life. In all these systems a great difference between eastern and western minds is at once seen. The western mind searches for truth. The eastern, assuming that God and man are one and that their present apparent dualism is due to ignorance and delusion, searches for the best method of liberating the soul from the bondage of material existence and even of personality, that it may recognise its oneness with God and be reabsorbed in Him, as a stream is absorbed into the ocean. Another difference is that Hindu orthodoxy is made to consist not in the doctrines that may be taught, but in the simple acknowledgment of the divine authority of the Veda. That tribute paid and caste accepted, the philosopher is free to base his system on pure reason, whether it leads him to pantheism or atheism, to deism or polytheism.

The common Brahmanical creed asserts the following positions ;—the eternity of the soul ; the eternity of the substance out of which the universe has been evolved ; the necessity of the soul being united to a body before there can be consciousness, will or action ; the worthlessness of the body ; a place of reward or punishment where a working out of the consequences of acts takes place, which, however, is not final ; and the transmigration of the soul through an innumerable succession of bodies. Speculation on these points led to unrestrained free-thinking, but the utmost liberty of thought has ever been a matter of tradition with the Brahmans. They instinctively feel that they represent intelligence.

II. THE DHARMA-S'ASTRAS OR SACRED LAW BOOKS.—Philosophy had to be kept within orthodox lines for the sake of society. The Brahmans therefore composed Law Books or Dharma-S'astras, containing precise rules for the constitution of society, for the due co-ordination of the different castes, and for the regulation of everyday life. The most celebrated of these codes is that which bears the name of Mēnu, who was declared to be the son of Brahmā. In the first chapter of his Institutes, the divine sages or rishis are represented as asking Mēnu, as he sat meditating on the supreme God, to teach them the sacred laws :—

“ He, the secondary framer of all this visible world, having narrated the mode of creation, appoints Bhrīgu to promulgate to them the code of laws, which he—having received in the beginning from the Supreme—had taught to Bh

given
In wh any v itself
and a harsh ferred enters
human
the K
from
The
subse
800)
The
and c
the fa
mind Chris
whic
succe succe
swee Budd
cravi
was Brah
In s Brah
reac
the
of I Budd
I
mod sus ritu cou

to Bhr̥gu and nine other sages. The basis of society is given as follows, in the chapter on Creation :—(28) In whatever occupation the Supreme Lord first employed any vital soul, to that occupation the same soul attaches itself spontaneously, when it receives a new body, again and again. (29) Whatever quality, noxious or innocent, harsh or mild, unjust or just, false or true, He conferred on any being, at its creation, the same quality enters it of course on its future births! (31) That the human race might be multiplied, he caused the Brahmans, the Kshatriyas, the Vaisyas, and the Sudras to proceed from his mouth, his arm, his thigh, and his foot.”

The development of Vedism into fully organised and subsequently reorganised Brahmanism extends from about 800 B.C. to 1200 A.D.

The extravagant sacerdotalism, the social prohibitions, and other abuses or excesses of Brahmanism, along with the fact that there were opposite tendencies in the Hindu mind, produced Buddhism in the sixth century before Christ. It is difficult to trace the actual relations which existed between the two systems during the succeeding centuries, but there can be no doubt that the success of Buddhism was so great that it threatened to sweep away the religious and social system of Brahmanism. Buddhism was the natural expression of the Brahman's craving after the attainment of perfect knowledge. It was at first simply a reconstruction and remodelling of Brahmanism, on what Gautama believed to be true lines. In some respects his teaching indicated a descent from Brahmanism. In other respects it was an advance by reaction, but the fact that, after a long contest between the two, Brahmanism re-established itself as the religion of India, ought to teach us that it represents forces that Buddhism ignored.

In the contest with Buddhism, Brahmanism became modern Hinduism. None of the old gods could be re-suscitated as an object for popular faith and love. Mere ritual, however splendid, and mere law, however ancient, could not satisfy the heart, while speculation must always be for the few. The Veda was utterly beyond the reach of the people, and the great legendary poems of the Ramayana and the Maha-Bharata, therefore, became popular Bibles. These epics celebrated the deeds of Rama and Krishna, heroes of ancient history. The religious instinct, under the pressure of the negations of Buddhism, formed these heroes into gods, and the Brahmins readily adapted their flexible pantheistic creed to the popular craving, by deifying them as incarnations of Vishnu. Here, again, we see how the new faith finds its germs in the old and its roots in history. The influence of the old epic poems on the Hindus is to this day extraordinary. Passages are recited by travellers and players at village festivals, and high authorities declare that they exercise a greater influence on the lives and feelings of Hindus than the Bible exercises on the peoples of Christendom. The Maha-Bharata consists of eighteen books and a hundred thousand metrical verses or distichs. It is compared by Hindu writers to a deep and noble forest abounding in delicious fruits and fragrant flowers, and watered by perennial springs. The main subject is the history of the race of Bharata and of the bloody struggles of two of its collateral branches for the sovereignty of the land; and with the old story, philosophical episodes, the production of a later age, are interwoven, expounding the doctrines not only of early but of later Brahmanism, especially the new doctrine of avatara or incarnation. The moral teaching differs but little from that of Buddhism. In this respect Brahmanism had gained in the course of its struggle with Buddhism. Krishna is the hero of the poem. In the philosophical episodes he is identified with the supreme, as one of the incarnations of Vishnu. "As such," he says, "whenever there is a relaxation of duty and increase of impiety, I then reproduce myself for the protection of the good and the destruction of evil-doers." The Ramayana treats similarly of Rama. The miracles, with the performance of which both Krishna and Rama are credited, are of a monstrous, fantastic and impossible kind, showing what the popular

Hindu
in the

W
mean
path
from
of the
philos

T
religi
by at
of th idola Arya
there
May
regio
tions
that.

Vish
lowe cent step
lege wov
with
the
it is vive late nee
—t imp
of bee
the
as
the
no

Hindu taste is, and also educating that taste still farther in the same direction.

When Brahmanism thus sought to popularise itself by means of the doctrine of incarnation, it entered on a path where descent was easy and rapid. Religion passed from the region of thought to the region of fable, in spite of the protests of successive reformers and the efforts of philosophers.

The new Brahmanism was partly the outcome of religious expediency, to head off the Buddhist reaction by attracting the aboriginal masses, who formed the bulk of the people and who could not rise above coarse idolatries; but it was also a genuine evolution of the Aryan mind, which is penetrated with the conviction that there is sympathy and intercourse between God and man. May not the great Preserver descend from the undisturbed region, to create again what has perished? The restorations which had succeeded destructions surely indicated that. These, it was said, must have been the times of Vishnu's descent, and if he descended in former ages in lower forms, why not also as a man? So, Krishna, the centre of innumerable legends, became deified. At each step in this process it was easy to add new myths and legends from nature and history. New speculations were woven into the theology, to connect its popular outgrowths with the original root. Idolatry became universal, but the primary idea of an inconceivable intelligence, whom it is the highest glory of the holiest man to behold, survived. The success and the wide acceptance of this latest form of Brahmanism is a striking testimony to the necessity of the central truth of Christianity. This truth—the incarnation of the Lord Jesus Christ—although implicit in the revelation that man was made in the image of God, and although the previous history of Israel had been a preparation for it, was quite beyond the horizon of the Jewish people. They had been trained for centuries as pure monotheists. Had the truth not been given to them as an actual revelation, and presented to them, too, not in words but in the life of an actual person, it would never have been evolved by them. As it was, the fact was so alien to popular preconceptions that the apostles could not grasp it for years, and the early Jewish church lapsed gradually into an Unitarianism, which regarded Jesus as a mere man. Mohammed, too, as a Semite, always recoiled from the idea that a man could be God incarnate as outrageous blasphemy. When the root idea of a religion comes from a soil in which there was nothing that could naturally produce it, we are entitled to explain it as a special revelation.¹ It is otherwise with the idea of incarnation in Hinduism. The soil there was suited to it, and we can trace the growth of the idea in the history of the people. The Jewish mind would never have deified Samson, David, or Judas Maccabæus. Whereas, the Hindu mind has no difficulty in believing that Vishnu became incarnate, as a fish, a tortoise, or a boar; or as Rama Chandra, type of manly virtues; or as Krishna, type of a soldier's life in its licentiousness as well as courage.

III. THE BHAKTI-S'ASTRAS, OR SACRED BOOKS TREATING OF FAITH.—The four Vedas represent the first phase of the religion of India, and contain the germs of all future developments. The Brahmanas and Upanishads, with the philosophical systems and the Law Books, represent the second phase, and extend over the period when Brahmanism was fully developed and existed side by side with Buddhism. The great epics, revised by the Brahmins from a theological point of view, represent the next phase, when the doctrine of Incarnation became prominent. The eighteen Puranas, written subsequently, and the Tantras—a later development of the Puranas, intended to give prominence to the worship of the female energy of some god, especially the wife of Siva in one of her many forms—represent the modern and sectarian phase of this astonishingly luxuriant religion.

¹ Marcus Dods, D.D., Mohammed, Buddha, and Christ. Pp. 200-202.

“T dialog
to the two gr founta curren
Bhara
occupy as the allowe
length grossly
the P abridg various other tone of
and th
profou
and so
the P ing th
of hu
panth
from return
The
speci vagan
the H salva Saiva
thou ditio
Prof Indi
grim
und

as, the fact he apostles
 yish church
 h regarded
 a Semite, uld be God
 e root idea as nothing
 led to ex-rwise with l there was the idea in ould never accabæus.
 a believing rtoise, or a virtues; or ousness as

ED BOOKS
 present the contain the manas and
 and the od extend developed
 The great yical point
 doctrine of a Puranas, r develop-
 nce to the especially resent the luxuriant

ad Christ.

“The invariable form of the Purana is that of a dialogue, in which a person relates its contents in reply to the inquiries of another.”¹ They are all based on the two great epic poems, the Maha-Bharata being the chief fountain, for, say the Hindus, “there is no legend current in the world that has not its origin in the Maha-Bharata.” So important is the place which they now occupy in religious life, that Hindus speak of them as the fifth Veda. That term, however, should not be allowed them without protest. They are insufferably lengthy and wearisome, and the Tantras are often grossly immoral. The aggregate number of verses in the Puranas is 400,000, and these are said to be an abridgement from millions. They repeat, expand, and variously systematise the cosmogony, mythology, and other fables and traditions of the epics. But, while the tone of the ancient legends is grave and often majestic, and the thought of the philosophical episodes subtle and profound, the tone of the later works is generally puerile and sometimes indecent. The sole objects of worship in the Puranas are Vishnu and Siva, the former representing the principle of free grace and the latter the principle of human merit. The fundamental thought is always pantheistic, “though the particular deity, who is all things, from whom all things proceed, and to whom all things return, is different according to individual sectarian bias.” The Vaishnavas, or worshippers of Vishnu, take as their special Bible the Vishnu Purana, it being full of extravagances in praise of faith in Vishnu. The Saivas take the Bhagavata Purana as their Bible, and from it preach salvation by works and faith in Durga. The Vaishnava and Saiva sects represent almost all the present religious thought and life of Hinduism, and they reveal it in a condition of decay. India is evidently awaiting a new birth. Professor Wilson, speaking of the actual constitution of Indian society, says that “devotional ceremonies, pilgrimage, penance, and abstract contemplation have an undue preponderance in the estimation of the people, even the best informed among them, over active duties and the precepts of morality. As to the common people, they have a still lower scale, and they find a ready substitute for the inconvenience of all moral restraint in the fervour of that faith which they place in Vishnu, and the unwearied perseverance with which they train a parrot or a starling to repeat his names, to articulate Krishna-Rādā, or Sitā-Rām." Sir Monier Williams believes that "the worship of Vishnu continues to this day the great conservative element of Hinduism"; but he also says: "I verily believe that the religion of the most of the Hindus is simple demonolatry. Men and women of all classes, except perhaps those educated by ourselves, are perpetually penetrated with the idea that from the cradle to the grave they are being pursued and persecuted not only by destructive demons but by simple, mischievous imps and spiteful goblins. This, in my opinion, is the true explanation of the universal worship of Ganesa, lord of the demon hosts."

¹ Vishnu Purana, translated by H. H. Wilson, pp. 10, 11.

I have sketched the development of the religion of India and of the successive books in which its religious life found expression. Such a sketch, however, gives only an external view. If we could see beneath the surface we should find, all down the stream of Indian history, holy wise, and spiritually-minded men, poets and philosophers, priests, reformers and devotees; but—it must also be admitted—no man who can be held up to all the world for all time as its teacher, example, and Saviour,—as mediator with God and the true life of man; not one who cries with authority to all races, "Follow me"; not one whom we could follow. We find writings for which inspiration is claimed, more absolute than that claimed by the Swiss scholastics of the eighteenth century for the Bible, writings that vastly exceed our Scriptures in volume; but they are discordant in their teaching, instead of converging towards one central truth and person, and witnessing to One who gathers in Himself every ordinance and prophecy. We find miracles, but they are divorced from t

the pu histor
at by Hi
have
man
shall for it let us
thoug
immo
the S sacrif
of sel
every
man' earth
It sp
the S on or come
the l stand
and
has natio degr India
thou
spiri
in th depe peop

from the moral order and history of the world. Neither the pure crystal of personal character nor great facts of history are pledged to them. They are now laughed at by every educated Hindu.

Hinduism may be regarded as a reservoir into which have run all the varied religious ideas which the mind of man is capable of elaborating. How true this is we shall not fully see until we have sketched Buddhism, for it too is a product of India. But, in the meantime, let us do justice to Hinduism. It expresses beautiful thoughts concerning the supremacy of Intelligence; the immortal nature of the soul; the right attitude of man to the Supreme; the importance of meditation, prayer, and sacrifice; the necessity of incarnation and propitiation, and of self-surrender, faith, and good works. It gave, in almost every epoch of its history, profound teaching concerning man's natural sinfulness and weakness, the littleness of earth and time, and the grandeur of spiritual perfection. It spoke comforting words concerning the goodness of the Supreme, his sympathy with us and his interposition on our behalf. Promises were made of a better age to come which, no doubt, cheered many a heart crushed with the load or torn with the contradictions of life. Notwithstanding, the people of India found not the true God; and so while the hopeful promise of their early religion has ended in a jungle of debasing idolatry, their later national history presents a picture of corresponding degradation. When the Mohammedan invaders entered India, Hinduism could not stand before them. But, though Mohammedanism triumphed, it did not meet the spiritual necessities which had tried to express themselves in the religion of India. Whether Christianity can do so depends upon whether its interpreters can give to the people what they have been groping after for centuries.

CHAPTER VI

SOURCES OF THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF HINDUISM

The institution of caste—Grounded in race necessities and religious duty—Social condition that resulted from it—Testimony of the first Greek observers—Supremacy of the Brahman a benefit to society for centuries—Caste now meaningless and hurtful—Attitude to it of Hindu reformers—Need of substituting something positive in its place—That supplied by Christianity—A native church essential—Hindu conception of God profound but one-sided—Conception of man also inadequate—Persistence of Hindu thought with regard to God and man—Pantheism the great strength and weakness of Hinduism—Its doctrine of incarnation an illustration of this—Our duty to the people of India.

WHAT are the sources of the strength and weakness of the religion of India?

1. The institution of caste, with the Brahman as supreme. This, more than anything else, has compacted the structure that has endured for ages. Caste seems to us essentially anti-national and anti-social, but it originated in religious and still more in race necessities. This is its vindication and the explanation of its astonishing permanence. The Aryan invaders, on establishing themselves in the land, saw that they were few in number compared to the subject races, and that if they were to preserve their higher civilisation and religion they must guard the purity of their blood, as jealously as the Jews after Ezra's day guarded themselves by means of the law of Mos or as t

have Kaffir
God's
their f
was a Greek
gave t
who w
that t
above
to the
a lie.
existe conten
tions
more
sophis
study
that is the one w
man, Unse
ally t
must medi
or in betw
is fun
the V mort prac
to th
the
ance
of o inte

of Moses from the filthiness of the surrounding heathen, or as the Dutch boers in South Africa in our own time have kept aloof from the Hottentots, Bushmen, and Kaffirs, regarding them as Canaanites and themselves as God's people. The Brahmans valued the inheritance of their fathers too much to imperil it lightly. The result was a social condition which excited the admiration of the Greek observers, who, twenty-two centuries ago, first gave to Europe pictures of life in India. Megasthenes, who was resident ambassador at a court in Bengal, tells us that the women were chaste and the men courageous above all other Asiatics; that they required no locks to their doors, and that no one was ever known to tell a lie. The outstanding characteristic of society was the existence of a set of men whose great business was contemplation, and who submitted to astonishing privations and austerities that they might meditate or think more effectually. These men the Greek observers called sophists or the wise, because their first business was study. They were the Brahmans, for we must remember that the Brahman was never merely a priest. Brahmā is the absolute Intelligence, and the sage aspired to be one with him. The Brahman believed that there is in man, but not in all men, a capacity for beholding the Unseen Being. The sons of God, therefore, must not ally themselves with the daughters of men. Elect souls must keep themselves pure and be trained by perpetual meditation on Brahmā. For this purpose their laws or institutes were designed. The idea of a separation between the twice-born man and the merely animal man is fundamental. The twice-born man must, by study of the Veda, by duly observing rites and sacrifices, and by mortifying the affections and lusts of the flesh, learn to practise abstraction of spirit and maintain his relation to the unseen Brahmā. Thus he may hope to arrive at the perception of the perfect one and obtain deliverance from personal existence. All this was for the sake of others as well as for his own sake. Not only is his intelligence the expression of the Divine Being, but he is the mediator between Brahmā and the rest of the universe.

We are sometimes disposed to think that the Brahmans deliberately adopted caste and surrounded it with an intricate and elaborate system of defence, for their own glory or profit, or that they themselves might lead lives of pleasure at the expense of their fellow-men. That is not the way in which anything that has life comes into being, nor is it the rock on which anything permanent is ever built. That which lasts must have its roots in the nature of things and not in the selfishness of an individual or a class. The stern theory of duties which the Brahmans worked out, the faithfulness with which they observed them, and the reverence which they received for centuries from all classes are the best proofs that they were actuated, not by love of ease, but by a high sense of obligation. Even now, when the day of their power is drawing to its close, they bear, in their fine features, high foreheads and dignified carriage, the manifest imprints stamped on them by a noble past. They were the ordained high priests of Intelligence. Their discipline was intended to prevent their being debased by mixture with people in whom the lower nature predominated. This was the aim of the institution, and the aim of the code of Menu and other inspired law-givers. Caste had to be declared eternal, something that had its foundations in the Creator, something, therefore, that could never be changed.

This, along with racial pride or necessity, was at the basis of the distinction between twice-born men and sudras, and even between the Brahman and inferior castes. It is impossible to deny the grandeur of the aim; but, as it was based on only partial truth, it had only a partial success. Like every other noblesse, the Brahmans had virtues of their own, and they performed incalculable service to the people of India; but the distinction between spiritual and animal men cannot be maintained along the lines of natural descent, no matter how urgent the necessity or how severe the training or how

ST
overv Thin
Brah
he w
cont
and
came reass insti grow wher
to tr
depr
It c resis
in th it, a
that to i Nag
mov
cour
hori abov
and soci
ever stren
and Indi
and or t did
that Ind
able excl
tion
fost

the rest of the

the Brahmans
and it with an
for their own s might lead
r fellow-men.
that has life which anything sts must have the selfishness theory of duties thfulness with nce which they he best proofs ease, but by a en the day of bear, in their carriage, the
a noble past.
Intelligence. eir being dee lower nature stitution, and inspired law-al, something
r, something,

y, was at the
orn men and inferior castes.
the aim; but,
only a partial Brahmans had incalculable
the distinction not be main-o matter how ning or how overwhelming the advantages of the favoured caste. Things turned out as might have been expected. The Brahman became his own god, and from believing that he was the perfection of humanity there arose in him contempt for others, haughty disregard of their rights, and practical denial of human brotherhood. Then came the mighty reaction of Buddhism. Brahmanism reasserted itself, after centuries of oscillation, but the institution which had been useful as the natural outgrowth of one condition of society could only be injurious when artificially imposed upon another out of deference to traditional theology or social preconceptions. Caste, deprived of its old life, became the curse of India. It destroyed national unity and so made successful resistance to invasion impossible. All that is generous in the young life of the people is now arrayed against it, as a dogma that must be discarded and a system that must be abolished, if India is to rise again to its former glory. Here is the testimony of B. B. Nagarkar of Bombay, one of the leaders of the theistic movement known as the Brahma-Somaj:—"In western countries the lines of social division are parallel but horizontal, and, therefore, range in the social strata one above another. In India these lines are perpendicular, and, therefore, run from top to bottom of the body social, dividing and separating one social stratum from every other. The former arrangement is a source of strength and support, and the latter a source of alienation and weakness. Perhaps at one time in the history of India, when the condition of things was entirely different, and when the number of these castes was not so large, or their nature so rigid as now, the institution of caste did serve a high purpose; but it is long, too long, since that social condition underwent a change. . . . Caste in India has divided the mass of Hindu society into innumerable classes and cliques. It has created a spirit of extreme exclusiveness; it has crowded and killed legitimate ambition, healthy enterprise and combined adventure. It has fostered envy and jealousy between class and class, and set one community against another. . . . Therefore, the first item on the programme of social reform in India is the abolition of caste and the furtherance of free and brotherly intercourse between class and class, as also between individual and individual, irrespective of the accident of his birth and parentage, and mainly on the recognition of his moral worth and goodness of heart." There are differences of opinion regarding the resisting power that still exists in Brahmanism and the extent to which the Brahmo-Somaj expresses the higher life of modern India or is likely to be a factor in its future, but men like Rammohun Roy, Keshub Chunder Sen, P. C. Mozoomdar and his co-workers show, at any rate, movement in a hopeful direction.

But caste can be abolished only when something equally positive and more in accordance with the truth of things is prepared to take its place. The fundamental truths on which it stood, viz. the divine right of the spiritual man to rule and the consequent necessity of his keeping himself unspotted from the world, must be recognised in Hindu society, in forms suited to Hindu life. These truths are imbedded in our Sacred History, and caste will disappear when they become living forces in the Christian Church of India. Abraham was called to be the father of a multitude of nations. He was separated from home, kindred, and ordinary ties, in order that he might do for the world the great work of grace that Jehovah purposed. His family received a sacramental sign of that separation. When the people began to mix with the nations round about them and walk in their evil ways, they were warned that God required them to be a peculiar people. Accordingly, they were separated from their neighbours as well as from all moral evil, by rigid law. This condition of things has come to an end, but the truth that it was intended to teach is stated still more emphatically in the New Testament.—"That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit." "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the

kingd
priesth tion, a ciaius authen
that m
and th
commu
inherit
at in withou
remain call of
Only a Huma Christi
every
and n
for no Christi Christi
establi flexion
Such a leaning or func
to rem
its gra take i dangere

2.

Hin
and of from fi
in the books,
and in
exists
the lov

fore, the first India is the
and brotherly also between the accident of the recognition
' There are
g power that to which the modern India
out men like
. Mozoomdar
ovement in a

en something with the truth fundamental right of the cessity of his
, must be re-
o Hindu life.
History, and
ing forces in n was called
ns. He was nary ties, in e great work mily received

When the round about e warned that
le. Accord-labours as well condition of a that it was atically in the f the flesh is rit is spirit."
not see the kingdom of God." Christians are called to be a royal priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, a chosen generation, a holy nation, a peculiar people. The Church claims to be a body of twice-born men, and to be an authentic, continuous, indestructible witness to the facts that man needs to be delivered from all that is sinful and that there is deliverance for him, that man needs communion with God and that life with God is his inheritance. Christianity then fulfils the object aimed at in the characteristic institution of Brahmanism, but without condemning any man or class of men to remain animal. The gospel despairs of none. The call of Jesus is universal, but it is a call to holiness. Only as the Church is filled with His spirit is it His body. Humanly speaking, the cause of God on earth depends on Christians being men of Christ-like character and on every country having a church suited to its history and national life. This is especially true of India, for nowhere else is there a more religious people. Christianity will be judged there by the conformity of Christians to the highest standard, and by its power to establish an independent church instead of pale reflexions of Romanism or of any Protestant denomination. Such a church must take root in the soil, instead of leaning upon foreign support for its creeds, formularies, or funds. Unless there is such a church, caste is likely to remain for many a day. Its sudden abolition or even its gradual decay, without any framework for society to take its place, would be attended with the gravest dangers.

2. The teaching regarding God and man.

Hinduism is pantheistic. We find a conception of God and of man's relation to Him fundamentally the same, from first to last, under every possible form of statement, in the Veda, in the philosophical systems, in the law books, in the lyric poets, in the dramatists, in the epics, and in the Puranas and Tantras alike. That nothing exists absolutely but I rahmā; "that everything, from the lowest estate of a straw to the highest estate of a God is Brahmā"; that the human soul is an emanation from it; that in order to get into the closest possible relation with it, we must, while here on earth, break all connection with objects of desire; that we "should pass through life without attachments, as a swimmer in the ocean strikes freely without the impediment of clothes; that, like a reed torn from its native banks, like wax separated from its delicious honey, the soul of man bewails its disunion with melancholy music, and sheds burning tears like the lighted taper, waiting passionately for the moment of its extinction, as a disengagement from earthly trammels and the means of returning to its only beloved,"—these are thoughts that are familiar to every Hindu, and no religion that does not recognise their power will ever prevail in India. "The religion of the modern Hindu, his character, ay, even his mode of thought, is the same now as in the time of Cālidāsa, or still more in that of Vyāsa and Vālmiki. If there be any change at all, it is only that of day to night."¹

To prove this, extracts from works so different as the Institutes of Menu and the Bhagavad-Gītā may be given. Bhrīgu, whom Menu appointed to promulgate to the other divine sages the code of laws which he had received in the beginning from the Supreme, concludes the chapter on Transmigration and Final Beatitude as follows. "Thus did the all-wise Menu . . . disclose to me from his benevolence to mankind this transcendent system of law which must be kept devoutly concealed from persons unfit to receive it. Let every Brahman with fixed attention consider all nature both visible and invisible as existing in the Divine Spirit; for then he cannot give his heart to iniquity. The Divine Spirit alone is the whole assemblage of gods; all worlds are seated in the Divine Spirit, and the Divine Spirit produces, no doubt, by a chain of causes and effects consistent with free-will, the connected series of acts performed by embodied souls. A Spirit by whose energy alone all else exists: a Spirit by no means the object of any se

¹ The Bhagavad-Gītā, by J. Cockburn Thomson.

abstra
which imagi
and n
as tra Menu
in In pure
He, v cause
tion,
like t
in his acqu sorbe

Ag
as shr
he se Krish
himse
comp instru
tion o
there
But,
aband
crime peris worse suffic

"Th

For t

Ne'er

Here

manation from ossible relation all connection
ss through life cean strikes
; that, like a eparated from ls its disunion tears like the moment of its trammels and l,"—these are
and no religion
ever prevail in ndu, his char-
e same now as all, it is only

so different as vad-Gítá may inted to pro-
code of laws
n the Supreme,
and Final Bese Menu . . .
mankind this kept devoutly
it. Let every all nature both ine Spirit ; for
The Divine
ds ; all words Divine Spirit
nd effects cones of acts per-whose energy
s the object of hompson.

any sense, which can only be conceived by a mind wholly abstracted from matter and as it were slumbering, but which, for the purpose of assisting his meditation, he may imagine more subtil than the finest conceivable essence and more bright than the purest gold. Him some adore as transcendently present in elementary fire ; others in Menu, lord of creatures : some as more distinctly present in Indra, regent of the clouds and atmosphere : others in pure air : others in the most high Eternal Spirit. It is He, who pervading all beings in five elemental forms, causes them by gradations of birth, growth, and dissolution, to revolve in this world, till they deserve beatitude, like the wheels of a car. Thus the man who perceives in his own soul the supreme soul present in all creatures acquires equanimity towards them all, and shall be absorbed at last in the highest essence."

Again, in the Bhagavad-Gítá, Arjoona is represented as shrinking back from battle with his royal kindred when he sees their well-known faces in the opposing lines, but Krishna, who has been acting as his charioteer, reveals himself as Vishnu and urges him to slay them without compunction, saying that in so doing he will be only an instrument, as they are killed already in the determination of "the All," and as the duty of caste is supreme, there is nothing better for Kshatrya than lawful war. But, he continues, if thou wilt not join in this fight, thou abandonest thine own duty and glory and contractest a crime. And mankind will, moreover, relate of thee imperishable ignominy. And to a noble man infamy is worse than death. A brief extract from this address will suffice to show the teaching and the tone of the poem :—

"Thou mourn'st for those thou should'st not mourn, albeit thy words are like the wise ; For those that live or those that die may never mourn the truly wise.
Ne'er was the time when I was not, nor these, nor yonder kings of earth ;
Hereafter, ne'er shall be the time when one of us shall cease
to be.

The soul within this mortal frame glides on through childhood, youth and age :

Then in another form renewed, renews its stated course again.
All indestructible is He that spread the living universe,
And who is he that shall destroy the work of the indestructible?

. . . Then, on to battle, Bharata !”

Note how the great tenets of Hinduism are here enunciated ; the eternity and immortality of the soul, the mortality and mutability of the body, the transmigration of the soul, and the existence of a Supreme Spirit to whom the existence of the universe is to be ascribed, from which everything proceeds, and to which everything returns.

Undoubtedly the Hindu conception of God is very profound, but it is one-sided and fatally defective. It takes no account of the personality of God, of His separation from man, His sovereign will and the essence of His character, as righteousness, purity, and love. In the mind of the Hindu, the moral and the immoral are both contained in the Supreme, and there can therefore be no real distinction between the two. Similarly, the personality of man is ignored. Our consciousness that we are persons, which should be decisive, counts for nothing. We know that every man, though recognising his littleness, distinguishes himself from the universe, from his kind and from God. Life is therefore the great reality, and each of us is free to possess or to sacrifice himself. But our life is represented by Hindu thought as an illusion. It does not consist in perpetually reaching out to perfection and so realising our true self, but in the annihilation of will and personality, that is, in spiritual suicide.

The Bible teaches emphatically that God is Intelligence. No language can be more explicit than that in which the Wisdom literature asserts that the Supreme is Wisdom and that kings and judges rule by Wisdom. But it teaches the Transcendence as well as the Immanence of God. The opposite truths of Mohammedanism and

Hin
the
foun
Isra
true
that
on fact prom
must activ
the indo
F Hin
swel hunc Brah
in co
phil
matt
able
the
of ch
too,
and tent
any shad
ever
The
emb
is th is un cally
for s are
T
sum

through child-
course again.
universe,
the indestruct-

ism are here
of the soul,
y, the trans-
of a Supreme e is to be as-
and to which

God is very defective. It God, of His
and the essence
y, and love.
the immoral
ere can there-
p. Similarly, consciousness
cise, counts ough recognis-
the universe,
therefore the possess or to ted by Hindu
st in perpetu-fising our true ersonality, that od is Intelli-

t than that in the Supreme
e by Wisdom.
e Immanence
nedanism and

Hinduism are thereby united ; and in the Incarnation of the Son we learn that the adequate image of God is to be found in man. To that central fact all the history of Israel pointed, on it the Church is based, and by it the true ideal is presented to man. The Bible also teaches that it is man's privilege to meditate on God ; to reflect on His wonderful Word and works ; to speculate on the facts of life. Nowhere is this side of duty made more prominent than in the Book of Psalms. But meditation must find its fruition in rational activity. Only by such activity is character perfected and the best solution of the mysteries of life found. Mere meditation tends to indolent quietism or to dehumanising asceticism.

Pantheism has been the strength and weakness of Hinduism. This fundamental principle has gradually swelled the thirty-three gods of the Vedas to three hundred and thirty millions. It has enabled the Brahmans to adopt every god with which they came in contact, to acknowledge every idol and to supply a philosophic basis for its worship. Each new deity, no matter how misshapen, is simply another of the innumerable streams that lead to the ocean of Liberation, and the old worshippers become Hindus without the necessity of changing their religious forms or their lives. Buddha, too, has been accepted as the ninth incarnation of Vishnu, and there would be no objection to calling Jesus the tenth. The worshippers of Krishna, however, under any arrangement of this kind would continue to overshadow all others, his sovereignty being maintained, for every new generation, by repetitions of his incarnation. The acceptance of the immoral Krishna, as the great embodiment of the Supreme, shows how truly pantheism is the weakness and disgrace of Hinduism. Its ideal is unmoral. It is independent of character and practically declares that virtue and vice are alike indifferent for salvation. Let us be thankful that the best Hindus are far superior to their ideal.

The people of India are our fellow-subjects. What a summons is involved in this fact, to all who believe that history is a revelation of the will of God ! Men are needed to go to them in the spirit of Paul, who saved the Church from becoming a Jewish sect, and who was persecuted on that very account. India has been preparing during this century for Christ. A tremendous revolution, social, political and religious, is going on all over the land. The compact fabric of Hindu society which has triumphed over the rude assaults of Mohammedanism and the missionary fervour of Buddhism, and which has seemed able to defy the corrosive influences of time itself, is being undermined at all points by Western thought, by contact with the agencies and instruments of Western civilisation, and by forces generated by its own vigorous life. Just as Christianity triumphed over the religions of Greece and Rome by absorbing from Greek philosophy and literature and from Roman jurisprudence all in them which was good and true, so must it triumph in India. That will mean its triumph, in due time, in other lands as well as India ; for there is no race so religious as the Hindu, so devoted to the ideal, and so contemptuous of the life of sense. We know a little, and we should know more of that wonderful epoch in their history, when, after the death of Gautama, missionaries from the highest classes in society went forth to all the surrounding lands and gathered in mighty harvests. So shall it be again. Who shall venture to say that the vitality of this noble race is exhausted ? God will raise up a prophet to teach with power that in Christ all the wisdom and power needed for the regeneration of India are hid. He will enable him to give Christianity a form as suited to the Eastern mind as the decrees of the first four General Councils were suited to Europe. Missionaries by the thousand will then stream over the Himalayas and to the remotest ocean to tell to all Asia the good news of Jesus Christ and Him crucified, as the wisdom of God and the power of God to every one who believeth. For Christianity alone has elements to satisfy the deepest aspirations of Hinduism. —“ There is something in Pantheism so deep that nought in bar Panthe

Deism
I find words
explai
actual Christ
under

Men are who saved the who was peren preparing s revolution,
 ver the land.
 as triumphed
 sm and the has seemed me itself, is thought, by
 of Western own vigorous
 the religions
 k philosophy
 dence all in t triumph in ue time, in is no race he ideal, and We know a nderful epoch
 of Gautama, ty went forth
 d in mighty ll venture to s exhausted?
 u power that ded for the sable him to Eastern mind ouncils were ousand will the remotest Jesus Christ
 nd the power stianity alone of Hinduism.
 o that nought

in bare Deism can meet it. Deism is not so deep. And Pantheism may well keep the house till a stronger than Deism comes to take possession of it. In Jesus Christ I find the only true solution of the mystery." These words of the late Dr. Duncan (Horae Peripateticae) explain why Mohammedanism, though succeeding in part, actually consolidated Hinduism as a whole, and why Christianity is certain to prevail, when it is rightly understood.

CHAPTER VII

BUDDHISM

Buddhism a branch of the religion of India—Identified with one name, though now multiform—The sacred books of Buddhism—The explanation of their Christian colouring—Early life and character of the founder of Buddhism—The Great Renunciation—His attainment to Buddhahood—The four great truths—Meaning of Nirvana and of Karma—The Middle Path—The ethical code of Buddhism—Its social organisation—The power of Gautama's personality—His missionary fervour—Spirit and zeal of his disciples—His life—Last words—Death—The times then ripe in India for a democratic movement—Individualism and rationalism of Buddhism—Interactions of Buddhism and Brahmanism—Result, the decay of Buddhism and the rise of modern Hinduism.

BUDDHISM is related to Brahmanism somewhat as Christianity is to Judaism or Protestantism to Romanism. In all three cases the branch has become mightier, if not more populous, than the parent stock. As regards Christianity and Buddhism, in each case a universal religion has developed from one strictly local, and both are now almost strangers in the lands that gave them birth.

The founder of Buddhism lived and died a Hindu. Neither he nor the Brahmins of his day thought that the new faith that he preached was incompatible with the old. He would have claimed that he was a correct exponent of the spirit of the ancient Vedic faith. His disciples simply claimed that he was the greatest, wisest and best of the Hindus. As there were "Reformers before the Reformation" in Europe, so in India there were sages before Gautama who were dissatisfied with the Brahmanical system; but he was the Hindu Luther, in whose voice all previous voices blended, and whose personality fused into living unity forces that had been long gathering, and originated a movement that swept over India and all but submerged for a time the monuments, institutions and ordinances of the ancient religion.

Buddhism thus—unlike Hinduism—is identified with the name of one man, in whose life, teaching and personality we find its secret. It would, however, be a great mistake to fancy that a study of the story and character of Gautama will throw much light on modern Buddhism. Originally a system of Humanitarianism—with no future life and no God higher than the perfect man—it has become a vast jungle of contradictory principles and of popular idolatry, the mazes of which it is hardly worth while to tread. "It passes from apparent atheism and materialism to theism, polytheism and spiritualism. It is under one aspect mere pessimism; under another pure philanthropy; under another monastic communism; under another high morality; under another a variety of materialistic philosophy; under another simple demonology; under another a mere farrago of superstitions, including necromancy, witchcraft, idolatry, and fetishism."¹ But, after all, the power of any religion is to be found in its ideas and in the personality of its founder. Men will return to these as to a living fountain which may have been choked for centuries with sand and driftwood. Clearing away the rubbish, they see again the living water. Drinking of it, they will rejoice all the more when the full river of the water of life—sufficient to satisfy the thirst of all lands—breaks upon their astonished vision.

¹ Monier Williams, Buddhism, p. 13.

India—Identical—The
multiform—The nation of their character of the annunciation—His great truths
—The Middle
—Its social personality—
his disciples—
es then ripe in individualism and of Buddhism Buddhism and

somewhat as testamentism to h has become parent stock.
each case a strictly local,
lands that gave

ed a Hindu.
ought that the ible with the
as a correct
c faith. His

THE SACRED BOOKS OF BUDDHISM.—A strong Christian colouring is found in the sacred books of Buddhism which at first puzzled scholars. Some writers explained this by saying that Buddhism, being the older, must be the parent religion, and that Jesus or the writers of the New Testament must have come in contact with Buddhistic ideas or legends. Jesuit fathers declared that the devil, foreknowing the details of the promised Messiah's life, anticipated them by a caricature in Gautama. Others contended that the Buddhistic documents had gradually received modern accretions. This is the true explanation. "A biography of Buddha," says Oldenberg, "has not come down to us from ancient times, from the age of the Páli texts, and we can safely say no such biography was in existence then." "There is not," says Dr. Eitel, "a single Buddhist manuscript in existence which can vie in antiquity and undoubted authenticity with the oldest codices of the Gospels, and the most ancient Buddhist classics contain scarcely any details of Buddha's life, and none whatever that are of peculiarly Christian character." In justice to the Buddhist scribes, we must remember that their literary ideas and their defective historical sense made borrowing appear to them perfectly legitimate. All that we are concerned about is to know that every authority would now agree with the conclusion of Kuenen—"I may safely affirm that we must abstain from assigning to Buddhism the smallest direct influence on the origin of Christianity."¹

HISTORY OF THE FOUNDER OF BUDDHISM.—Siddharta was the son of the Rajah of Kapilavastu (now the village of Bhūila), a town between the holy city of Benares and the Himalaya mountains. The family name was Gautama and the tribe was the Śakyas. Hence, when Siddharta became an ascetic he was called Śakya-Muni or the monk of the Śakyas. The word Buddha—from the root Bud, to know—is generic.

¹ Kuenen, National Religions and Universal Religions, p. 251. See also Note at the end of this chapter.

When
have a
to us mental
By
enligh
Fe certain legend
them.
the P
memo
human
"Exc
of reli
of Bud
he is his se seem tated self-a dom
the un
by fo
In
a kin petty Gaut
custo
the u
for heart
unres
be c influ
the
did
beco

When a devotee became enlightened, he was said to have attained to Buddhahood. The name thus reveals to us the kinship of original Buddhism to the fundamental Brahmanic principle of reverence for intelligence.

By what process did Siddharta or Gautama become enlightened?

Few facts about his early life are known with certainty, and it is difficult to distinguish these from the legends that the enthusiasm of his followers wove round them. But, after making all allowances for accretions, the picture remains of an extraordinary man, the memory of whose life, thirst for truth, and love for humanity ought to be honoured to the latest generations. "Except Christ alone, there is not, among the founders of religions, a figure purer or more touching than that of Buddha. His constant heroism equals his conviction; he is a finished model of all the virtues that he preaches; his self-denial, his charity, his unalterable sweetness, seem not to fail for a moment."¹ His disciples imitated him and propagated the faith with an enthusiasm, self-abnegation and success, which the history of Christendom cannot surpass; and his religion is the only one of the universal religions that never sought to propagate itself by force or persecution, even when it had the power.

In India, in the sixth century before Christ, the son of a king, even though the king was only the Rajah of a petty state or a zemindar, had all the world at his feet. Gautama was married, at the early age dictated by custom, to the daughter of a neighbouring Rajah, and the union was one of affection. He was distinguished for bodily vigour, intellectual power and purity of heart and life. What was lacking? "The divine unrest" of noble souls possessed him. That could not be charmed away by power and splendour, by the influences of home or the duties of his station. Even the birth of a son, after he had been married ten years, did not fill his heart. The idea that the new tie might become a bond too strong to break, seems, on the contrary, to have decided him to leave all and follow the promptings of his higher nature, though he should go out "not knowing whither he went." Every picture of old age, of disease, or of death, made him ask the question—What is the meaning of this apparently endless, transitory, suffering life? The only person who seemed to him superior to the influences of time and the body was the ascetic, the man without ties and relationships, living in and for the spiritual, preserving his dignity even when holding out a mendicant's bowl for rice. We must remember that Orientals, Hindus especially, are prone to take a pessimistic rather than our optimistic view of life. In India, too, the universally accepted belief in transmigration produces in the thoughtful a positive loathing of existence. This added, in the mind of Gautama, to "the weary weight of all this unintelligible world." Surely there must be some explanation of the secret of life. If only that could be learned, what, compared to it, were all other wisdom! Convinced that the one thing needful was to find out this secret, he—at the age of twenty-nine—tore himself away from wealth, power, home, parents, wife and child, making what Buddhists call "the Great Renunciation." Exchanging garments with a beggar, he betook himself as a penniless student to one celebrated teacher and then to another, whom he found in secluded forests, and from them learned all that Brahmanism could teach, from the inspired oracles of the Veda, or their own speculations, concerning the way of emancipation and union with the universal soul. Unsatisfied with their teaching, he betook himself to the jungles, accompanied by five disciples, resolved to test the principle of orthodox Brahmanism, according to which the soul can become independent of the body and obtain superhuman power, and finally salvation, through asceticism. By that means and by constantly murmuring the mystic syllable ôm, with mind concentrated on Brâhma, of whom all worlds are "the outer fringes," the devotee becomes prepared for union with the supreme. He gradually

¹ Barthélemy St. Hilaire.

becom
becom
bubbl proce
and t merge sunny tried-
obtain
say—salvat
more.
and skies.
ance
penan
of th began
five d
when selves
mour
had b

W
thoug
follow
duties
these cises
One
under
know
tree
the c night
As th
his u
man
shou

becomes possessed of supernatural powers. His mind becomes clairvoyant. Material forms seem to him as bubbles on the surface of a sea of ether. Finally, the process of thinking is suppressed. Personality is lost, and the soul, escaping from its confines in the finite, merges into the innermost soul, to throb for ever in the sunny ocean of divine existence. For six years, Gautama tried—as few ascetics even in India have ever tried—to obtain liberation by this method. He could afterwards say—“If any other man thinketh that he may trust for salvation to works of merit and self-mortification, I more.”—But he found the way as unsatisfactory as Paul and Luther afterwards found it under other forms and skies. At last—when he had reduced his daily allowance of food to a single grain of rice—and when his penances were extorting the admiration of all who heard of them—in sheer disgust he ceased his efforts and began to take food like other men. This to his five disciples meant apostasy. They abandoned him when he most needed their sympathy, and betook themselves to the holy city, Benares, where they spoke mournfully of the failure of one from whom so much had been expected.

Was there then no way of peace or salvation? The thought of returning home and confessing that he had followed a will-o'-the-wisp, now suggested itself. The duties of his station called him. Was it right to neglect these and the ordinary round of social and religious exercises? With this temptation and with others he wrestled. One day, he sat down to eat his simple morning meal, under the shade of a ñg-tree (Ficus religiosa), to be known thenceforward by all Buddhists as the Bo tree or tree of wisdom, and to be esteemed sacred by them as the cross is by Christians. All day long and through the night he sat there, meditating, reflecting, questioning. As the sun rose again, the truth dawned on him that all his unrest and misery came from his desires, and that man himself was surely greater than these. Why, then, should he be their slave? That was to him the moment of illumination. He saw the open secret that man had only to be true to himself in order to rise permanently superior to appetite, desire and misery; and that in the extinction of desires, through inward culture and love to others, lay the solution of the mystery of life. Before the simplicity and power of this way of salvation—salvation from the lower self, especially from the craving for continuous personal life—sacrifices and penances lost their efficacy and the Veda its supernatural authority. Caste was seen to be a convention and God to be unnecessary. The whole world changed to Gautama in that moment. All things became new. The desert rejoiced, and the wilderness became vocal with praise. Is not the world to every one just what he himself is?

Think where Gautama, according to our point of view, now stood. Through the inspiration of the Divine Spirit he had gotten an insight into the truth—"He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life shall find it";—not into the root and all the relations of that profound truth, because he could not see it in Him, who is the root and life of the soul, and separated from whom the truth itself cannot take hold of humanity with power. But what he did see filled him with deep joy. It is music like that of Israel which we hear in the pithy verse in which he summed up the way to salvation:—

"To cease from all sin, To get virtue,
To cleanse one's own heart—
This is the religion of the Buddhas."

Gautama saw that along this way was deliverance from desire, and therefore from the future misery of those endless transmigrations which had weighed on his spirit like a heavy pall. From that moment, when the truth burst on his mind with all the power of supernatural revelation, the chains of earth fell from him, and, claiming the title of Buddha, he went forth from the wilderness with an air that betokened that his heart was fixed, resolved to teach humanity the precious

secr clea
of in
and peac
state
of "
sorr
(c) over
ing
T Gau
nec
heal
com
to b
T
suff
sens
T
com Nir
(as pass app hear mys
exis mea
the prev
and caus
"nor as v
is e
of c con

hat man had permanently and that in culture and
 story of life.
 of salvation
 from the crav-
 and penances
 ral authority.
 od to be un-Gautama in The desert
 with praise.
 himself is?
 point of view, Divine Spirit
 e that findeth life shall find s of that pro-
 Him, who is from whom the
 with power.
 p joy. It is he pithy verse
 on :—

thas."

s deliverance are misery of weighed on moment, when the power of rth fell from he went forth
 ened that his y the precious

secret that he had learned. Two truths were hereafter clear to him :—(1) That we are saved through the power of inward culture and active love, and that all sacrifices and asceticisms are dead works ; (2) That this way of peace and salvation is open to all men alike. His own statement of these two positions was given in the formula of "the four sublime verities :"—(a) There is pain or sorrow because of existence ; (b) This comes from desire ; (c) Pain and sorrow may be made to cease by conquest over desire, and that conquest is equivalent to the attaining of Nirvana ; (d) There is a way that leads thither.

The first of these verities tells what had driven Gautama from his home. Existence in any form necessarily involves suffering. Birth or death, illness or health, is suffering. Clinging to the five elements, that compose every being, is suffering. It were better not to be.

The second was the discovery of the cause. All suffering is caused by lust or desire of three kinds—for sensual pleasure, for wealth, and for existence.

The third was the discovery of the remedy. Here comes in one of the characteristic words of Buddhism, Nirvana. The ordinary meaning of the word is extinct (as fire), set (as the sun), defunct (as a saint who has passed away). To Gautama, Nirvana meant the disappearance of that restless condition of mind and heart, which would otherwise, according to the great mystery of Karma, be the cause of renewed individual existence. By the doctrine of Karma or "Act" is meant that every man's condition in this life is the consequence and exact equivalent of his acts in a previous state. All worlds come into existence, change and vanish in obedience to an absolutely rigid law of cause and effect. This law takes the place of one or more gods, personal or impersonal. The doctrine that as we sow we must reap, and must reap all that we sow, is extended to the deeds done by us in previous states of existence. As long as we have not exhausted the consequences of our past actions, we must continue to be reborn in one form or another, unless, indeed, we have been so bad that at death we are born into hell, where once imprisoned we must remain for thousands of years. At the end of this terrible period of suffering, the man may be reborn as a plant or worm, and laboriously win his way, by righteous living, back into higher states of being. Naturally, extinction is regarded as a paradisiacal escape from such a future. With Gautama, the doctrine of Karma took the place of transmigration. As Buddhism does not acknowledge a soul in man, the link of connection between one state of existence and another is not the soul but the Karma of the being who dies. Round that there gathers a new outward form or body, with its equipment of material attributes, sensations, ideas, potentialities and thought. The Karma of the previous being determines the locality, nature and future of the new being. Gautama, not being able to accept the doctrine of transmigration, postulated this mystery of Karma as a moral cause of the unequal appointments of happiness and misery in this life. Notwithstanding the fact that every man has lived a long series of connected lives, he who follows Buddha's law will attain to Nirvana and cease to be. His Karma is exhausted.

The fourth verity is the basis of the moral and religious code of Buddhism. The way to Nirvana is by following the middle path, which consists in eight things :—right belief, that is, in the Buddha's doctrine ; right resolve, that is, to abandon all ties that interfere with becoming a monk ; right language, or the recitation of the law ; right behaviour, or that of a monk ; right mode of livelihood, or living by alms ; right exertion, or suppression of self ; right mindfulness, that is, of the impurities and transitoriness of the body ; and right meditation, or composure of the mind into trance-like quietude. There are four stages on this path.¹

These four verities in which Gautama rested would not have given to Buddhism its extraordinary success. On them Gautama built up a system of morality, ¹ Rhys Davids, Buddhism, pp. 108-110.

the es
to th
social
and r ciples
truth
Sangh
for all Order
in Sa Buddh
the tie
monk,
bread.
been tender invoke
and th
differ
five co shalt r
shalt r
cating
ism an additio
They
times
specta
ments receivi
money
long ti owner inculca
withou
chariti
where expose a race

indeed, we
n into hell, ousands of ffering, the laboriously
gher states as a parautama, the ation. As n, the link
and another who dies.
m or body,
sensations,
rma of the
and future
e to accept his mystery ppointments withstanding ies of con-
ill attain to austed.

moral and rvana is by s in eight s doctrine ;
at interfere
he recitation monk ; right xertion, or t is, of the and right trance-like p.¹

ested would ary success.
f morality,

the essence of which he found in Brahmanism, superior to that of every religion save Christianity ; also, a social organisation well adapted to Eastern life, habits and modes of thought. When dying, he told his disciples that he left them in his stead two witnesses of the truth he had taught, namely, Dharma (the law), and Sangha (the Order). Hence, to this day, the formula for all Buddhist neophytes, on being received into the Order, is, "I take my refuge in Buddha, in Dharma and in Sangha." That is, I vow to imitate the life of Buddha ; I accept his teaching or law ; and I renounce the ties of life, of society and property, and become a monk, content to dress in rags and to beg for daily bread. Buddha, Dharma and Sangha have long since been elevated to the rank of deities by the personifying tendencies of the Eastern mind. Their names are invoked in prayer as the three great objects of refuge, and they appear as gigantic idols in the temples of the different countries of Eastern Asia. Gautama enjoined five commandments on all :—Thou shalt not kill ; Thou shalt not steal ; Thou shalt not commit adultery ; Thou shalt not speak untruth ; Thou shalt not taste intoxicating drink. The first four he received from Brahmanism and he himself added the fifth. He enjoined five additional commandments on members of the society :— They were required to abstain from eating at forbidden times ; from dancing, singing, music and worldly spectacles ; from garlands, scents, unguents and ornaments ; from the use of a high or broad bed ; and from receiving gold or silver. The prohibition not to receive money was held to be the most important and was for a long time obeyed, but, subsequently, monasteries became owners of property and of immense revenues. Gautama inculcated the virtues of resignation, of long-suffering without limit, of forgiveness of injuries, and all the charities and duties that are most required in countries where almost every one, from the cradle to the grave, is exposed to sore suffering, and that are most congenial to a race that is naturally of a mild and gentle disposition.

But the great secret of the Buddha's success is to be found neither in the four verities nor in his moral code, but in his own personality. His system without himself would soon have been dead. It is almost impossible to over-estimate the power of his personality. The following story illustrates it, as well as his method of teaching, and the spirit with which he inspired his disciples :—

A rich merchant of the name of Purna, being converted, resolved to forsake all and go to a neighbouring savage tribe in order to win them to Buddhism. Gautama apparently tried to dissuade him—

“The men of Sronaparanta, where you wish to fix your residence,” he said, “are violent, cruel, passionate, fierce and insolent. When these men address you in wicked, brutal, gross and insolent language, when they storm at you and abuse you, what will you do, O Purna?”

“When they address me in wicked and insolent language, and abuse me,” replied Purna, “this is what I will think. These men of Sronaparanta are certainly good and gentle men, who do not strike me either with their hands or with stone.”

“But if they strike you, what will you think?”

“I will think them good and gentle, because they do not strike me with cudgels or with the sword.”

“But what if they do strike you with the sword?”

“I will think them good and gentle, because they do not completely deprive me of life.”

“But if they do deprive you of life, what then?”

“I will think the men of Sronaparanta good and gentle, for delivering me with so little pain from this body full of vileness.”

“It is well, Purna,” said Buddha; “with your perfect patience you may dwell among the Sronaparantakas. Go thou, O Purna, thyself delivered, deliver others; thyself arrived on the other shore; help others thither; thyself comforted, comfort others; having attained complete Nirvana, guide others to it.”

Purna went on his mission and succeeded. Shall we err in that e hamm

of Hir largely
Him,
measu
Ga
his fai
so, it
on arr
later l
—“W
this do in des quietu
than h
to pro
under years
dead—
when expoun
which
the se
They
belove
the fir
to est next c
next t
repea
Order
discip
others
he sa
that royal righte

ess is to be moral code, hout himself
ossible to ality. The method of inspired his

g converted,
uring savage Gautama

sh to fix your ionate, fierce
u in wicked, hey storm at rna?"

and insolent
this is what are certainly e either with

hink?"
cause they do
d." e sword?"

cause they do

t then?"
ta good and ain from this

"with your Sronaparan-
ered, deliver
; help others
ers; having it."

d. Shall we err in giving the name of the Spirit of God to the power that enables one man to so transform others. Mohammed, Confucius, Lao-Tse and successive reformers of Hinduism had it in measure, but none of them so largely as Gautama. He seems to come nearest to Him, to whom the Father gave the Spirit without measure.

Gautama at first hesitated whether he should proclaim his faith to others. Instead of his being required to do so, it was apparently his duty to cease from all action on arriving at enlightenment and peace. According to later legends, Mara, the evil one, suggested this to him:—"With great pains, blessed one, hast thou acquired this doctrine (Dharma). Why proclaim it? Beings lost in desires and lusts will not understand it. Remain in quietude. Enjoy Nirvana." But Gautama was greater than his creed. He went forth from the wilderness, first, to proclaim his way of salvation to the two Brahmans under whose instructions he had placed himself seven years before, and then—finding that both of them were dead—to the five disciples who had abandoned him when he renounced the way of asceticism. To these he expounded the four noble truths and the middle path which avoids the two extremes—the life of subjection to the senses and the life given up to self-mortification. They believed, for there was no resisting a teacher so beloved, when he spoke with authority, and they became the first members of the fraternity that he had decided to establish. A high-born youth, named Yasa, was the next convert. Then four friends of Yasa, and, within the next three months, fifty more of the same class in society repeated the triple formula and were admitted to the Order. The Buddha at once sent out these sixty disciples in different directions to teach and to preach to others what they had heard from him. "Go ye now," he said, "and turn the wheel of the excellent Law," that is, according to Mr. Rhys Davids, "set rolling the royal chariot wheel of a universal empire of truth and righteousness;" the wheel being the sign of dominion, and the turner of the wheel one who makes his chariot roll unopposed over the world.

For the next forty-five years the Buddha continued to preach his doctrine, travelling from place to place during fine weather, and, during the four rainy months, from June to October, going "into retreat" and instructing chosen disciples. The details of this period of his life, and especially of his visit to his former home, are profoundly interesting. He went to the city where he was to have been king, as a mendicant, alms-bowl in hand, begging from house to house. When his aged father entreated him to go and beg elsewhere, and not bring shame on the royal house he had forsaken, the Buddha calmly replied—"You, O King, are faithful to your ancestors, who were kings; but my descent is from the Buddhas of old, and they, begging their food, have always lived on alms."¹ When the Buddha felt his end drawing near, he spoke to Ānanda, his cousin and favourite disciple, the following words, which show clearly that he maintained the fundamental position of his system to the last:—

"O Ānanda, I am now grown old, and full of years, and my journey is drawing to its close; I have reached eighty years—my sum of days—and just as a worn-out cart can only with much care be made to move along, so my body can only be kept going with difficulty. It is only when I become plunged in meditation that my body is at ease. In future, be ye to yourselves your own light, your own refuge; seek no other refuge. Hold fast to the truth as your lamp. Hold fast to the truth as your refuge; look not to any one but yourselves as a refuge."²

And, shortly before his decease, he said,—

"Behold now, O monks, I exhort you—Everything that cometh into being passeth away; work out your own perfection with diligence."

These were his last words. Long before, he had

¹ Rhys Davids, Buddhism, pp. 64-80.

² Monier Williams, ibid. p. 49.

attained
he now till the fire of

It is succeeded
which ear of ready to see took the sp
time to practic politica priestly Kshatr
pretens
with s against ripe fo
empire popula Stoicis
in Eur
of the rousing tion at especia
to the
and fr
found
which attach his do people
words
people
and fr
intro

his chariot

a continued
ce to place
ny months,
nd instruct-
eriod of his t home, are y where he ms-bowl in n his aged re, and not rsaken, the faithful to ent is from food, have felt his end cousin and which show position of all of years, ave reached a worn-out

move along, fficulty. It on that my es your own Hold fast
he truth as rselves as a

-Everything
rk out your ore, he had attained Nirvana or extinction of the fire of desires, and he now passed through the four stages of meditation till the moment came for his Pari-Nirvana, whereby the fire of life also was extinguished.

It is not very difficult to understand why Buddhism succeeded. Gautama's own personality and the sacrifices which every one knew he had made gave him the willing ear of the people of India, a people who are always ready to follow any religious teacher in whose life they see tokens of contempt for the world and of obedience to the spiritual. Buddhism also commended itself for a time to the common people as the highest form of practical religion that had ever been taught, and as a political and democratic protest against extravagant priestly pretensions and religious monopolies. The Kshatriyas, who had submitted with reluctance to the pretensions of the Brahmans, embraced the new faith with special eagerness. Rajah after Rajah declared against the old and for the new. Besides, the times were ripe for such a movement, as they were in the Roman empire when unbelief in the old gods and consequent popular immorality gave rise by reaction to the elevated Stoicism of Epictetus and the Antonines; as they were in Europe in the sixteenth century, when the degeneracy of the monks and priesthood was the chief factor in rousing the popular conscience to clamour for a reformation and in giving momentum to the new movement, especially in the purer north. Buddhism also appeared to the masses as a protest in favour of liberty, equality and fraternity. While the first aim of Gautama was to found an order of mendicant monks, membership in which was necessary to attain to Nirvana, multitudes attached themselves to it as lay-brethren, attracted by his doctrine of universal brotherhood. He spoke to the people, too, in their own language, and he enforced his words by using the literary forms that the common people always hear gladly; dialogues, parables, fables, and frequent repetitions. "Probably he was the first introducer of real preaching into India, and by his practical method he seemed to bring down knowledge from the clouds to every man's door."¹

Buddhism, in one of its great spiritual defects, had another charm for man. It preached a consistent and thorough individualism, and thus united to its moral, social and political forces the impulse that made the Illuminism of Germany in the eighteenth century the prevailing European fashion. It appealed to man's self-sufficiency by declaring that he could attain to fulness of knowledge and to perfect righteousness by his own unassisted efforts. What man could not understand was to be disbelieved. Reason was able to penetrate to the innermost secrets of the universe, and revelation was unnecessary.

Of the long contest of Buddhism and Brahmanism—or rather of their interaction in India—we know little. There were probably local persecutions, but Hinduism is not given to the use of the sword or the rack. Its essence is tolerance, provided that no interference with caste be attempted; while Buddhism not only made its way by persuasion alone, but, in its system of propagating its doctrine by a celibate order, was akin to the spirit of Hinduism. According to accounts given us by the Greek observers before Christ, and by the Chinese pilgrims who visited the holy land of Buddhism between the fourth and seventh centuries of our era, it would seem that the various currents of Hindu religious life flowed as peacefully side by side then as they do now. In the celebrated caves of Elorā, filled with marvels of sculpture that belong to a period probably between our third and sixth centuries, "Brahmanical, Buddhist and Jaina caves are seen side by side, and their inmates, no doubt, lived on terms of fairly friendly tolerance, much as the members of the Anglican, Roman Catholic and Wesleyan communions live in Europe at the present day."² Buddhism actually became more idolatrous than Hinduism, and gradually dropped its distinctive features of ultra-pessimism and

¹ Monier Williams, Buddhism, p. 52.

² Ibid. p. 170.

own knowledge

l defects, had consistent and to its moral,
that made the h century the to man's self-n to fulness of
by his own
ot understand to penetrate to revelation was

Brahmanism—ve know little.
but Hinduism
the rack. Its interference with ot only made its system of der, was akin g to accounts Christ, and by holy land of h centuries of rents of Hindu
y side then as of Elorā, filled a period proburries, "Brah-
seen side by l on terms of embers of the n communions ddhism actually and gradually pessimism and

Ibid. p. 170.

atheism. It thus lost its individuality. The old religion absorbed its popular features of equality, fraternity and even in some cases the abolition of caste distinction; and, by identifying the heroes of the nation with Avatars or descents of Vishnu, it took new hold of the imagination and heart of the people. Buddhism, Vaishnavism and Saivism each borrowed ideas and practices from the others, but, under this interaction, Buddhism, as a distinct system, faded away, and for centuries it has had no hold on India. The old faith took it into its arms and sucked out its life-blood. Hinduism, however, incorporated into itself so much of the spirit of Gautama, that we can still trace it in the manners of "the mild Hindu," as he is named, half scornfully, by the disciples of Him who called Himself "meek and lowly."

NOTE TO PAGE 110.

Of the sacred books of Buddhism, there are two collections, representing respectively Southern and Northern Buddhism. We do not know when either was first committed to writing. We are not certain even with regard to the time when the founder of Buddhism lived. While a Chinese account gives the tenth century before Christ, there are ancient inscriptions in India which place the date of his birth or death in the third century before Christ. 543 B.C., the date assigned by the Buddhists of Ceylon for his death and indirectly confirmed by coins and inscriptions, was for some time commonly accepted, but Mr. Rhys Davids would bring it more than a century nearer our time, and Sir Monier Williams is satisfied with saying that "we shall not be far wrong if we assert that he was born about the year 500 B.C." The southern canon, called the Tri-pitaka or three baskets, from the way in which the leaves in each volume were originally kept together, was determined about 250 B.C., at a council of the Buddhist church held at Pataliputra, on the Ganges, under the auspices of the Emperor

Asoka, the Buddhist Constantine and a much better man than the Roman Emperor. This collection is about twice the length of our Bible and is written in Páli, a language the origin of which is a matter of controversy, though a probable supposition is that, it was originally a modification of Sanskrit and at the time a vernacular where the Buddha lived. Mahendra, the son of Asoka, took this canon or part of it with him, when he went, as a Buddhist mendicant, accompanied by his only sister to Ceylon, and converted the people of that island to the faith. From Ceylon, Buddhism spread to Siam, Burmah and adjoining lands, in all of which—though rejected in India—it has remained to this day. The northern canon, written in a debased Sanskrit, is very voluminous. It was determined at a much later date, and has been swollen by developments that make the religion entirely different from what its author intended. The northern church includes an overwhelming proportion of the Buddhists of the world and calls its method and canon the Great Vehicle, in contradistinction to the Little Vehicle of the southern church. It tells, for instance, that the Buddha was born of a virgin; was welcomed at his birth by angels and received by an old saint, endowed with a prophetic vision; that he was presented in the temple, baptized with water and afterwards with fire; that he astonished the most learned doctors by his wisdom, was led by the Spirit into the wilderness and tempted by the devil; that he went about preaching and working miracles; that he was the friend of sinners and was transfigured on a mount; that he descended into hell and ascended into Heaven.

“About the middle of the fifth century, Nestorian missionaries reached Central Asia and made numbers of Buddhist priests of Tibet acquainted with the story of Christ's life and with the ceremonial of the Catholic Church. True to the eclectic instincts of Buddhism, the Tibetan priesthood then and in subsequent centuries adopted as many Christian ideas, traditions and ceremonies, as they thought compatible with Buddhist ortho-doxy.”¹

church in Roman C
cardinal,
with the
tion and i and antip procession is quite c whatever

doxy."¹ In the fifteenth century, a reformed Buddhist church in Tibet adopted the whole organisation of the Roman Catholic Church, and so we find there, pope, cardinal, prelate, bishops, abbots, priests, monks, nuns; with the ritual of infant baptism, confirmation, ordination and investiture, masses for the dead, litanies, chants and antiphones, rosaries, chaplets, candles, holy water, processions, pilgrimages, saints' days and fast days. It is quite clear that Buddhist scribes are responsible for whatever borrowing there was.

¹ Eitel, Three Lectures on Buddhism, pp. 16-30.

CHAPTER VIII

SUCCESS AND FAILURE OF BUDDHISM

Success of Buddhism in the reigns of Asoka and Kaniskha—Its services to humanity—Its real failure—The cause to be looked for in its atheistic or agnostic position—Practical abandonment of this for Lamism, Adibuddhism or the worship of Bodhi-Satwas—Character of the people where Buddhism is supreme—Its mechanical worship—Value attached to vain repetitions—Its defective view of man—Consciousness of misery but not of guilt—Sin cosmical and forgiveness impossible—Supposed influence of such a view—Arises from inadequate conceptions of atonement and repentance—The ultimate aim of Buddhism really selfish—Buddhism and Christianity opposite poles, as regards their view of life—The position of Buddhism regarding the universal duty of celibacy and mendicancy its sufficient condemnation—How Christianity meets the fundamental truths that gave Buddhism its power—Our duty.

OF all the religions we have considered, none seem to give so much promise as Buddhism. What, then, is the verdict of history with regard to it? For, according as a religion has, in the long run and on a wide scale, elevated man, so is its truth. According as it has failed in this regard, so must there be defect. Humanity will judge it by the civilisation which it has produced and maintained.

The practical result of Buddhism is not what might have been expected from its spirituality, its ethical code and the lofty character of its founder. Undoubt-

SU
edly, Gaut
to an owing betwe
the w
son,
oppo natur
of ca
"bel
prop virtue
day w
he wa
"the empir
well made Köpp
rever
ment
more in dif
distan
empir
breath
will direct where
and v enjoin
and c
and C
religi
the In Budd
his pa

edly, it was singularly successful for a time. During Gautama's life, it spread quietly from one petty kingdom to another. After his death its progress was arrested, owing to internal dissensions in the Order and wars between rival states; but the unification of almost the whole of India under Chandragupta and his grandson, Asoka, from 320 to 250 B.C., gave it a great opportunity. Those emperors, being of Sudra origin, naturally favoured a teaching and system that made light of caste distinctions. Asoka, who took the title of "beloved of the gods," distinguished himself for zeal in propagating the new faith, and, for this as well as for virtues seldom found in kings, his name is honoured to this day wherever Buddhists are found. To the men of his time he was a universal monarch. To them India was as truly "the world" as China was to Confucius and the Roman empire to St. Luke. The noble character of Asoka, as well as his triumphs, his devotion and his missionary zeal, made him deservedly illustrious. "If a man's fame," says Köppen, "can be measured by the number of hearts who revere his memory, by the number of lips who have mentioned and still mention him with honour, Asoka is more famous than Charlemagne or Cæsar." He erected, in different parts of India, stone pillars at enormous distances from each other that testify to the extent of his empire, and he inscribed on these, and on rocks, edicts breathing the purest spirit of "peace on earth and goodwill to men." Among other commands, he gave directions for what may be called the first hospitals, where men and beasts were to be treated medically; and what is still more remarkable in a Buddhist, he enjoined quinquennial periods of national humiliation and confession of sins. His religion appeals "to Jew and Christian and Moslem alike, as part of the universal religion of humanity."¹ Three centuries later, Kanishka, the Indo-Scythian king of Kashmir, became to northern Buddhism what Asoka had been to southern. Under his patronage, Buddhism entered upon another period of great missionary revival. It may therefore be truly said that for a period of several centuries Buddhism was a mighty reforming force on a great scale. It conferred untold benefits on India, and on Eastern and Northern Asia. "It introduced education and culture; it encouraged literature and art; it promoted physical, moral, and intellectual progress up to a certain point; it proclaimed peace, goodwill, and brotherhood among men; it deprecated war between nation and nation; it avowed sympathy with social liberty and freedom; it gave back much independence to women; it preached purity of thought, word, and deed (though only for the accumulation of merit); it taught self-denial without self-torture; it inculcated generosity, charity, tolerance, love, self-sacrifice, and benevolence, even towards the inferior animals; it advocated respect for life and compassion towards all creatures; it forbade avarice and the hoarding of money; and from its declaration that a man's future depended on his present acts and condition, it did good service for a time in preventing stagnation, stimulating exertion, promoting good works of all kinds, and elevating the character of humanity."¹ This is a splendid catalogue of services, enumerated too by one whom Buddhists consider more candid than generous; but when we look for service still more radical and permanent the real failure of Buddhism is apparent. It has found its home only among the lower forms of civilisation. "It may be safely asserted that no Aryan race, while existing in anything like purity, was ever converted to Buddhism or could permanently adopt its doctrines."² The same assertion may be made regarding the reception of it by Semitic peoples. More generally, it may be said with truth that Buddhism has permanently elevated neither the race nor any nation that adopted it as the law of its life. It has not impelled man forward along the path of general progress. It is not associated with great historic movements. It has not been favourable to scientific research or produced any great literature or art. It has not widened man's soul. On the contrary, the character of the people where Buddhism prevails is unspiritual and unprogressive. In no religion is the priesthood so ignorant, worship so mechanical, and idolatry so general. Better fruit might have been expected, and there must be something radically wrong with the root, when the fruit has been so poor for centuries. Notwithstanding a period of brilliant promise, it may be said then to have failed. The failure of such a religion, "the one infallible diagnostic of which is a belief in the infinite capacity of the human intellect," testifies strikingly to the soul's need for God and to the true greatness of the soul. The main defects of Buddhism would seem to be its atheism and its consequent defective view of man. Let us consider these.

¹ Wheeler, History of India, vol. viii, p. 214.

¹ Monier Williams, Buddhism, p. 551.

² Fergusson, Tree and Serpent Worship, p. 57.

1. That it is atheistic or agnostic can hardly be denied, though there is an aspect from which it has been described as almost perfect theism. Buddha is clear light or intelligence diffused throughout the universe. As the highest form of intelligence is the perfect man, the only object of worship is the memory of the glorified Buddha or the images of others who shall come hereafter to earth as Buddhas, or, as in Tibet and Mongolia, some person whom the Lamas or priests decide to be the one in whom the spirit of Buddha dwells and who is regarded as the representative of perfect intelligence. The Grand Lama never dies; he is lost sight of in one form only to reappear in another; and the function of the other Lamas is to decide who he is or where he is to be found at any given time. When the soul of the Grand Lama has departed from his body, these select a child into whom they declare that the spirit of Buddha has passed, and they bring him up in a monastery with special care, preserving him from all sensual and impure influences. They teach him to look upon himself as the shrine of the divinity and as entitled to the homage of all men. These fictions have now to come into rude contact with the fact, that no decision can be arrived at as to which of the children born in Tibet when the old Lama dies is his reincarnation, until three candidates are proposed for election, acceptable to the Chinese government, or its residents at Lhassa. All power, too, has been taken out of the hands of the Grand Lama. Most of the children who are elected to the position "either die naturally or are made to die before they have gained any knowledge, and an elected chief Lama acts as regent or administrator of affairs, while the incarnated Buddha is supposed to lose himself in sublime heights of meditation and receive divine homage."¹

The fact that millions of devout Buddhists have for centuries accepted a substitute for God, which is little better than the Goddess of Reason whom the French Revolutionists set up for a time, or other substitutes, human, bestial, or wooden, to whom men have given the great name, is a commentary on the failure of Buddhism. Reverent agnosticism is preferable to such forms of theism. Gautama would have considered Lamism more childish and idolatrous than the metaphysical god of the Brahmins, whose doctrine of God he rejected, not so much because it was incapable of proof, as because an abstract, impersonal spirit could not be regarded as possessing existence at all. Existence without something to exist for, Intelligence without something to understand, Consciousness without something to be conscious about, Joy without something to rejoice about, are simply names for zero, though spelled with capital letters. Gautama therefore concluded that there was no such spirit. When the Brahmins in their turn pressed him for an explanation of the origin of the world and man, he disclaimed the character of a disputant and declared himself to be simply one "who participates in the great mass of evil that exists, and seeks only a physician." The only Creator that he recognised is Act-force or the mystery of Karma. No force can ever be lost, and there is nothing eternal but a perpetually revolving circle of causes and effects. Therefore it is that the wheel,

¹ Monier Williams, Buddhism, p. 286.

which
the w
The w
the sp
exister flower symbol

On
that for wh
is use
other
"The
is one a reli
came supre
The
is, p
from
by th future
their ascen Budd
need pious wors
extin imag
the imag
Aval
or of This
soul theo
origi
of t

which represents this doctrine and also its rolling over the world, is one of the chief symbols of Buddhism. The wheel-like form of the lotus—the petals instead of the spokes typifying the doctrine of perpetual cycles of existence—and the perpetual renewing of the beautiful flower after decay and death, make it another favourite symbol.

On account of its atheism, Sir Monier Williams says that "Buddhism ought not to be called a religion at all, for where there is no God there can be no need;" but it is useless fighting for a word when the facts are on the other side. A man like King Asoka was truly religious. "There is no gift comparable with the gift of religion," is one of his rock-cut inscriptions. Buddhism has been a religion to countless millions. Buddha himself soon came to be worshipped as supreme. In Nepal, one supreme Buddha called Adi-Buddha is worshipped. The Buddhist calendar is full of Bodhi-Satwas, that is, persons having as their essence knowledge derived from self-enlightening intellect, and these are worshipped by the people as the Buddhas who are to be in the future. They are now living as angels in Heaven, and their Karma will produce other beings in a continually ascending scale of goodness, until they are vested in Buddhas who will come to earth, as they may be needed. As Gautama has passed completely away, the pious Buddhist turns with more devout feelings of worship to those Bodhi-Satwas than to one who is extinct. In southern Buddhist temples, the pure white image of Maitreya, the Buddha of kindness, is found by the side of Gautama; and in northern temples, great images of Manju-Sri, the personification of wisdom, of Avalokitesvara, the personification of protecting power, or of Amitabha, "immeasurable light," are prominent. This universal abandonment of atheism shows that the soul will not dispense with God; still, as all this varied theological development is external to the spirit of original Buddhism, it has not affected the moral nature of the people very profoundly. In Buddhist countries, the people are hard, unsympathetic and barren. Morality, which was at first the distinguishing feature of Buddhism, has disappeared as a regulative or inspiring power. Buddhist worship is a strange picture of agnosticism combined with the greatest development of formalism that the world has ever seen. Buddhism is the only religion that has invented praying by machinery, or what Carlyle calls "the rotary calabash system," the principle of which is that there is a spiritual value in "vain repetitions." The prayer most frequently used is a mere formulary, consisting of the six-syllabled sentence, om mani padme Hūm, that is Om! the Jewel in the Lotus! Hūm! Whatever the origin and meaning of this prayer, no other prayer is considered so valuable or is repeated so often. An incessant stream of repetition of these six syllables is kept going on in some Buddhist countries, by mouth, and by turning cylinders on which the words are inscribed, by every known mechanical means. Cranks, winds, and waters are enlisted in the service, the object being to store up merit by incessant repetition of the prayer. A rich harvest awaits the European or American trader who first introduces dynamos into those countries. Where electricity can be obtained economically, prayer wheels can be easily arranged, with the words printed millions of times on scrolls of paper, and these can be kept revolving continually at a minimum of expense!

2. Gautama's defective view of man.

(a) Gautama had apparently no consciousness of guilt; it was not sin but misery that he yearned to be delivered from. He offered to remain at home if his father would guarantee him exemption from sickness, old age, death and future births. But the deepest misery of man is not poverty, pain, disease, nor death, but the burden of guilt. To Gautama's gentle nature, which abhorred everything like the infliction of pain, the sacrifices of the Brahmans were simply repulsive, because he did not realise the deep sense of need out of which sacrifices spring. He rejected the ideas of

SU
 propi mical matte
 If a r
 to the Budd
 forgiv
 able decla
 of si effect
 the in woul
 be n woul
 irrep
 fare
 these unde
 resul answe
 ment
 right a pe
 escap
 does
 in C loftie
 with Thon
 Cros
 passi
 self
 has there
 eleva
 relig
 (A

propitiation and atonement. To him sin was a cosmical, not a personal thing; inherent in the world of matter and inseparable from all forms of transient being. If a man sins, the punishment which nature has attached to the sin must take effect. There can be no remission. Buddhism thus took the position, with regard to sin and forgiveness, which some writers declare to be more favourable to morality than the Christian position. They declare that by "the Christian doctrine of the remission of sins the knowledge of the inevitable sequence of effects and causes is robbed of half its proper influence on the imagination;"¹ that without such a doctrine, virtue would have more stringent sanctions; that men would be more thoughtful and more beneficent; that they would know that the consequences of evil actions are irreparable; and that the human race would altogether fare better and be better off. A practical answer to these contentions is that the experiment has been tried, under the most favourable circumstances, and with results most unfavourable to morality. A rational answer is found in proper conceptions of love, atonement and repentance, especially in seeing that inflexible righteousness and purity are involved in love. That is a perversion of Christianity which teaches that we can escape the consequences of our sins by any process that does not involve radical repentance. The love of God in Christ makes us hate sin, and this explains why the loftiest morality has always been found in connection with the Cross. "There is forgiveness with Thee that Thou mayest be feared," said the Psalmist; and the Cross inspires us with this fear, as well as with passionate love to Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. A religion that knows nothing of guilt has not probed the wound of humanity. It cannot, therefore, give the remedy that man needs, cannot elevate our nature, and cannot be the permanent religion of humanity.

(δ) The ultimate aim that Buddhism sets before men

¹ Miss E. Simcox, Natural Law, An Essay in Ethics.

is a purely selfish one. One warm advocate of Buddhism¹ says that "Probably there never has been a system of morality so purely unselfish offered to the world. It held out no rewards, not even the personal existence of the saint, as a thing to be preserved at all; it was pure renunciation, divorce from all regard for oneself." Yes, but note that its conception of self is inadequate. Gautama denied the existence of the soul and made the extinction of individual being take the place of identification with Brähma. His view of the soul resulted from his atheistic position and his belief in the materialistic nature of all existence. According to him there is no such thing as a purely spiritual existence:—"He is a heretic who holds that man has a soul or permanent self separate from the body. There is no life that is not material and man's only salvation is not to be. The great problem comes to be how to commit suicide; suicide, not of that pitiful and illusive kind which rids a man of life in one particular form, but which rids him of existence in every form."² The great aim is thus not really unselfish but the very opposite. Mr. Rhys Davids indeed declares that the Buddhist in seeking Nirvana has a lofty motive for humanity as well as for himself; that he knows that by destroying his Karma he leaves behind him no inheritance of misery; he ceases to be, and no one takes his place; and thus he helps forward to the goal of non-existence. This is true so far as it goes, but it does not go very far. It means that the best men vanish and leave the masses in hopeless misery. The great aim is deliverance from personal suffering. The Buddhist dies to the lower, not that he may realise the true self, not that he may rise with Christ to newness of life, but that he may pass away into nothingness. He is to hate his life in this world, not that he may keep it unto life eternal, according to the well-balanced and lofty law laid down by Jesus, but in order that he may never have any more life. This defect of Buddhism also springs

¹ Mr. Mills.

² Marcus Dods, Mohammed, Buddha and Christ, p. 255.

from its whateve wholly sinner a that su
from hi suffering speaks nor from are our states o misery rejoiced
last wo
danger
and he them n
the sel
we mus
of Max remind religion
as in th
are ind
most es
feeling denying Christi
Father
making Son."

The
most state a really
men u commo
shall
what

from its atheism. There is nothing higher than man, and whatever he attains unto must be by his own merit and wholly for himself. He is not a creature, still less a sinner accountable to a holy God. He is a thing of fate that suffers, and all efforts must be directed to escape from his own misery. He is exhorted to be kind, long-suffering and forgiving, not from love to God, who speaks through His Spirit in our reason and conscience, nor from love to those who being children of one Father are our brothers indeed, but because with opposite states of mind are connected the desires from which our misery springs. Gautama's words when he exultantly rejoiced in the dawn of light in his mind, as well as his last words, clearly show that his own escape from the danger of rebirth was the great subject for congratulation; and he taught "the Way" to his disciples, that each of them might attain to similar blessedness. This view of the selfishness of Buddhism, even when it teaches that we must die to self, enables us to understand the words of Max Müller:—"In no religion are we so constantly reminded of our own as in Buddhism, and yet, in no religion has man been drawn away so far from the truth as in the religion of Buddha. Buddhism and Christianity are indeed the two opposite poles with regard to the most essential points of religion—Buddhism ignoring all feeling of dependence on a higher power and therefore denying the very existence of a supreme deity; Christianity resting entirely on a belief in God as the Father, in the Son of Man as the Son of God, and making us all the children of God by faith in His own Son."

The defective view of man taken by Buddhism is most clearly seen when it makes celibacy the loftiest state and mendicancy the highest ideal of life. This is really its sufficient condemnation. Instead of placing men under the law which Paul laid down and which common-sense sanctions, "he that will not work neither shall he eat," it tells them that they ought to eat only what they beg from others. All the ties of life are

Buddhism
system of world. It existence of
was pure
"Yes,
adequate.
made the place of the soul of in the
to him
ence:—
soul or is no life
not to be.
suicide;
which rid s him of thus not s Davids Nirvana
himself;
he leaves
es to be,
forward
far as it that the misery.
suffering.
y realise newness
ss. He y keep it
and lofty ay never springs

ignored. A premium is put on celibacy and on indolence. Such are the fruits which come from believing that existence is a mistake and a curse. No wonder that even Mr. Mills remarks on these as fatal shortcomings:—"Not less than one-third of the male population become Lamas or monks in the countries where the influence of Buddhism is greatest." And, "the monk with staff and alms-bowl asking for bread is not quite honourable or manly in the midst of working mankind."

The great cause then of the failure of Buddhism is that it did not reveal God. Agnosticism is always practically the same as atheism, and from atheism the heart recoils in dismay. We can see in Gautama himself, in his country and his time, in the very defects as well as the excellence of his doctrine, the explanation of his success. Speaking broadly, it may be said that the Brahmans offered men religious observances without morality. Gautama offered them morality without religion; and his system was accepted for a time as the more reasonable of the two. Yet, while both have failed, Buddhism has been the greater failure; and its failure proves that morality cannot be permanent, when dissociated from its root in God.

What are the affinities of Christianity with Buddhism? The Holy Scriptures declare that man is made in the image of God, and the promise to Israel was that God would exhibit His perfect image in a man, and that through him He would destroy death and sin. In the fulness of the times, this promise was fulfilled and now the risen Christ offers the Holy Spirit unto men, to make them sons of God. In yielding to His Spirit, we are yielding our powers not to an external force but to our rightful King. In the innermost depths of our being, His grace and our freedom are the same thing. That profound feeling of reverence for the human spirit and for the equality of all men which characterises Buddhism has thus its full vindication in Christianity. "And every subordinate idea which has grown out of these primary convictions in the mind of Gospel

pretend love of
to pres
had li remain
him fo follow
lead th
of the
worshi
from th
all the mind of the Buddhist has that which answers to it in the Gospel."¹ Gautama was only a man. He did not pretend to be more, though he won the admiration and love of the people by giving up everything to find and to preach salvation. But for doing so, he would have had little influence, for "the Asiatic apostle will ever remain an ascetic, a celibate, a Fakeer." Let us honour him for what he was and what he did; let us direct his followers to his life and its great lessons; and thus we may lead them from the light to be found in him to the Light of the World; from the Buddha who never sought to be worshipped, to the Saviour, who claims our worship; from the prophet of Kapilavastu to the Son, unto whom all the prophets bear witness.

¹ Maurice, The Religions of the World, pp. 297-211

THE END

